dealing with the Irish-Protestant conflict in Northern Ireland. Granted, the two groups professionally have a noticeable distance of comparison, but one shows an expansion of ideas while the other does not.

"Lifesong" does justice to a sound that's exploited by such preacher-pinstripe performers as Oral Roberts Jr., but the band needs to expand its variety through thought-provoking lyrics to ensure retaining the audience's attention span.

didate, he said.

McCloskey said the region must come to terms soon because Israel currently has an atomic bomb and has not signed the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Knowledge to build nuclear arms will expand through the region eventually, he said.

"It seems to me as inevitable that an Arab leader will rise to power who will know how to make an atomic bomb," he said. The area has tremendous potential to be the starting ground for World War III, which would destroy the world, he said.

Dining out HOMESTYLE

Co-owner of the Calico Inn, Trix Fasse (center), writes down orders from some of the restaurant's regular customers. People from Manhattan and K-State make up much of the establishment's business.

The Calico Inn which, on the outside, looks like the converted house that it is.

Inside, the room is small but cozy. A player piano sits in the corner. Old sayings decorate the walls, and antique tables and chairs are its only furniture. The faces of customers are friendly and sometimes familiar.

A sign adorns the front window, "Something's always cooking at the Calico Inn." Wedged between the Golden Oldies Antiques and the Calico Corner, the Calico Inn is just a few blocks off U.S. Highway 24 in Riley.

"It's nothing fancy," Judy Heikes, co-owner of the restaurant, said.

It may be nothing fancy, but the friendly, small-town atmosphere seems to keep people coming back.

Trix Fasse, co-owner and Heikes' sister, said people from Manhattan and K-State make up much of the inn's business.

Football games, Fasse said, especially the game against the University of Nebraska, gives business a boost, both from Nebraska fans headed into town and those looking for a restaurant after the game.

Older couples also are patrons of the Inn. Heikes said many people looking for antiques in the spring make their way to the restaurant.

The restaurant's main form of advertisement seems to be word of mouth. Heikes said many people come in and say they heard about the place from another friend who'd been there. A few years ago, Kansas! magazine did a story on the inn. Since then, the sisters said they have heard comments about how the article motivated some patrons to try the food.

Two K-State students, David Atherton, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, and Bruce Ladd, junior in agricultural economics, are just two of the many students who frequent the inn. They said eat at the Calico Inn about twice or three times a semester.

Whenever she gets the chance, Fasse said she sits down to visit with customers.

*"Methuselah ate what he found on his plate
And never as people do now
Did he note the amount of the calorie count
He ate because it was chow
He wasn't disturbed as at dinner he sat
Destroying a roast duck or a pie
To think it was lacking in lime or fat
Or a couple of vitamins shy
He cheerfully chewed every species of food
Untroubled by worries or fears That his health might be hurt by some fancy dessert
And he lived over 900 years"*

"I don't remember names very well," Fasse said. "But I get to know faces."

The friendliness not only extends to the patrons of the inn, but also to travelers passing through Riley. Heikes said that during the recent ice storm, a couple from Nebraska were caught in Riley with no place to go. The sisters put the couple up in the house next door, owned by Fasse.

The two sisters got into the restaurant business about six years ago when the building was put up for sale.

"I've always been interested in owning a restaurant," Heikes said. "Trix said, 'I'll buy the building if you pay the rent.'"

The Calico Inn is small and only seats 32 people, but the sisters said they don't plan to expand.

"It's more than we ever thought it would be," Heikes said.

Weekday evenings are the busiest time, Heikes said. However, the weekends keep her busy also.

Heikes said she barbecued 10 30-pound ribs for one weekend rib special and made 14 pies, which still wasn't enough.

A fire two years ago on Memorial Day closed the Calico Inn for about three months, she said. A gas leak in the grill caused an explosion, but no one was hurt. The resulting water and smoke damage forced the sisters to replace wallpaper and carpeting.

One famous visitor to eat at the inn was television star, James Arness, who played Matt Dillon, Heikes said.

"We were all busy paying attention to the woman's necklace (his date's necklace) and never noticed him," she said. "Someone else pointed him out."

Strangers often meet while dining at the Calico Inn. Because of the size of the restaurant, diners often must share a table with other people. Sitting with strangers doesn't seem to bother the patrons, she said.

"We've had a few people ask to wait, but most people don't seem to mind," she said.

Women's golf squad finishes 5th at home

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

"Better" was the key word to describe the experience of the K-State women's golf team during Monday and Tuesday action at the K-State Invitational — better weather and better scores as the squad posted a fifth-place finish in the 54-hole tournament.

The scene was a vast improvement when compared with the conditions during the recent Lady Shocker Invitational April 12 and 13, where the squad shot a team-total 1,124 on Wichita's rain-soaked course. The Wildcats finished fifth in the event, edging Wichita State University.

Under sunny skies Monday and Tuesday, K-State shot a 1,064 total — still good for the same fifth place as before, but a much-improved 60 strokes better.

The University of Missouri won the team title, shooting a 980 over the 54 holes. The University of Nebraska placed second with a 989, followed by the University of Iowa with 990 and the University of Kansas with 1,033. Wichita State placed sixth behind the 'Cats with a 1,071.

Sophomore Sharry Dercher once again led the Wildcat charge, shooting a three-day total of 260. Dercher's score of 277 also topped K-State's efforts at the Lady Shocker Invitational.

"I was pretty happy (with my play), but didn't like my last round," said Dercher, who posted rounds of 88, 84 and 88 in the tourney. "I'm finally reaching my potential."

Sophomores Paige Harrison and Anne Hegarty followed Dercher with scores of 266, while sophomore Terri Alexander rounded out the four-member team score with a 273. Freshman Shelley Sherman also finished the two days with a score of 300.

"It was their best team score," Head Coach Lila Levin said of the 'Cats. "I was pleased for the most part that they had some low scores because it's very difficult to play your own course sometimes. You have the advantage of knowing the course, but a player expects a lot of himself. He'll often put pressure on himself thinking he won't play well. Sometimes when you go away to a tournament you're more relaxed."

Levin said she was particularly pleased with the team's improvement and said it should help during the Big Eight Tournament April 23-25.

"I saw some promising signs," Levin said. "We're getting closer, and I think they'll feel more confi-

K-State's Sharry Dercher blasts the ball out of a sand trap on Manhattan Country Club's 18th hole Tuesday afternoon. Dercher shot a 260 over three rounds to lead the team. The University of Missouri won the golf tournament as the Wildcat's finished fifth out of the six teams entered.

K-State softball team to face Kansas

By HUEY COUNTS
Sports Editor

K-State's softball team will host the University of Kansas in a double-header at 3:30 p.m. today at CCo Park. The games will not count on the 'Cats' Big Eight Conference record.

"The conference made up our conference schedule, but we can add any games we want," Softball Coach Ralph Currie said. "Everybody (Big Eight teams) plays everybody else two times, and the seeding for our tournament (Big Eight Championships) is determined by these games.

"The reason we're playing KU is that we always play them on a home-and-home basis." The 'Cats will play KU in Lawrence April 29.

The Wildcats faced tough competition Saturday and Sunday at Iowa State University. They dropped all four of the contests they played, two against the Cyclones and two against the University of Oklahoma. K-State currently is at the bottom of the conference standings with an 0-4 record, 8-8 overall.

"Our play didn't disappoint me as much as the losses," Currie said. "Except for a few bad innings, we played pretty well."

"We played 28 innings of softball, and it was 3½ innings that killed us. We played more than 24 innings of good softball."

"Generally it was an error here and there that hurt us," Currie said. "Other times we were one play away from getting out of the inning."

Kathy Gillpatrick, a transfer from Johnson County Community College, absorbed the four losses.

"Kathy pitched as well as she could pitch. She's going to have to be able to pitch a lot of games for us down the line, and she did a good job."

Currie cited the weather as another factor that may have contributed to the Wildcats' losses.

"It was terrible the whole time we were there. It was rainy and

Blue Jays top Orioles, 3-2; Bell's single lifts Toronto

By The Associated Press

TORONTO — George Bell snapped a 2-2 tie with a single to center in the eighth inning and gave Toronto a 3-2 victory over the Baltimore Orioles Tuesday in the Blue Jays' home opener.

Willie Upshaw opened the eighth off reliever Tippy Martinez, 0-1, and after Cliff Johnson was intentionally walked, Bell stroked a single to center off Sammy Stewart, the third Baltimore pitcher.

Toronto reliever Jimmy Key and Dennis Lamp contained the Orioles.

The Orioles took a 2-0 lead in the fifth. Toronto starter Doyle Alexander lost his perfect game in dramatic fashion when, with one out, John Lowenstein slugged his first homer of the season over the center-field fence.

Ken Singleton then doubled and went to third on a single by Todd Cruz. Rich Dauer grounded back to Alexander and Singleton was retired on a rundown. Rick Demsey walked to load the bases. Al Bumbry hit a chopper that struck first base for an RBI single.

Toronto tied it at 2-2 in the sixth.

Lakers, Kings tip off tonight Softball

By The Associated Press

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — The Los Angeles Lakers, hoping to make their fourth trip to the National Basketball Association championship finals in five years, open the 1984 playoffs tonight against the Kansas City Kings.

Los Angeles, led by the NBA's all-time leading scorer, Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, and multi-talented guard Earvin "Magic" Johnson, are heavily favored over the Kings in the best-of-five series.

The Pacific Division champion Lakers posted a 54-28 regular-season record, second best in the league only to Boston's 62-20. The Kings, meanwhile, finished tied for third in the Midwest Division with a 38-44 mark and have the worst record of any team in the Western Conference playoffs.

While Kansas City Coach Cotton

Fitzsimmons hopes his team will rise to the occasion, the Kings would have to make a remarkable turnaround to beat the Lakers.

Los Angeles has lost just twice to Kansas City in their last 20 meetings and won all five of the contests between the clubs this season. And the Lakers, assured the homecourt advantage at least through the conference championships, haven't lost to the Kings at the Forum in 10 years, a span of 23 games.

"This is the biggest challenge this team and this coach have ever faced," Fitzsimmons said. "I don't think, though, that we'll throw in the towel."

Lakers Coach Pat Riley's main concern is a letdown by the Lakers.

"We could be in for a rude awakening if we take them lightly," he said. "I sure hope nobody is thinking that way. It could be like 1981 in the mini-series when Houston beat us."

That was the only time the Lakers haven't made it to the championship round of the playoffs in the past five years. They beat Philadelphia for the NBA title in 1980 and 1982, then lost to the 76ers in four straight last year.

The Kings are led by Eddie Johnson, who finished the regular season as the club's top scorer with a 21.9 average. Larry Drew led Kansas City in assists with a 7.6 average, and LaSalle Thompson was the top rebounder with 8.9 a game.

Kansas City center Joe C. Meriweather is doubtful for the series, since he's still ailing with a sprained left foot that sidelined him for the last eight games of the season.

The second game of the series is Friday night at the Forum, then the action switches to Kansas City for a day game Sunday.

windy. And many of our girls aren't used to playing in these conditions, since many of them are freshman who normally played in the summer," he said. "So under the circumstances, we did fine."

"It was freezing," K-State catcher Sherri Chacey said. "It (the field) was hard. It wasn't real muddy since they kept a tarp over it."

The Jayhawks currently are fourth in the conference with a 2-4 record.

"They've got an all-Big Eight pitcher, Tracy Bunge," Currie said. "We beat her a couple of times last year, but we don't have the same team. But we'll give them a couple of games."

Gillpatrick, 3-8, will pitch the first game against KU and freshman Lisa Tarvestad, 4-0, will throw the second. It will be Tarvestad's first outing against Big Eight competition.

Chacey said she thinks Tarvestad, a left-hander, will be able to hold her own against Kansas.

"I've only caught her twice, but I think she'll do all right," she said. "I think we can keep up with them."

Annette Kirkham, who also handles some of the catching chores, compared the two pitchers.

"I think Lisa's been throwing real well. She can hit the target real well, and if we move the ball around, I think she'll do all right," she said. "Kathy throws different pitches (a rise, drop, change, curve and fastball) and has thrown well, also."

K-State currently is hitting only .194 as a team, but Kirkham said she thinks the statistic is misleading.

"Most of the time (because of the weather), we only get to hit off of a pitching machine inside of Brandeberry (Indoor Complex). It only throws one pitch, so that hurts us," she said. "We've been able to get outside lately, so it might help."

The Wildcats will host the University of Nebraska and Oklahoma State University in a triangular Saturday and Sunday at CicCo Park.

Knight builds top Olympic team

By The Associated Press

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — The U.S. Olympic basketball team will be composed of players from the Bobby Knight mold — quick, defensive-minded, and willing to sacrifice themselves for the good of the team.

Knight and his staff, which includes about two dozen college coaches, began putting 72 of the nation's top amateurs through those evaluations Tuesday. The 72 will eventually be winnowed down to the final Olympic squad of 12.

"What we did today was simply try to set things up by position," Knight said at a news conference after the opening of the trials scheduled to end with doubleheader scrimmages at Indiana University's Assembly Hall Saturday and Sunday.

"Our primary purpose is to evaluate, not teach," Knight said.

Knight, who emphasized that the team will be picked on what it shows in tryouts rather than on reputation, made it clear the kind of player he wants.

"There are three things you've got to determine," said Knight, who believes a man-to-man defense is the best weapon for winning basketball. "Number one is can you play defense. Can you guard somebody? We've got some that can and some that can't."

"But they all have the potential to be able to guard someone. If we can't do that, we can't play successfully."

The second and third priorities are selfishness and quickness.

"We've got to be able to play unselfishly on offense. We've got to be able to see what's going on, get the ball where it should go, have the kind of movement that enables us to get people open."

The players selected this week will return for a mini-camp in mid-May.

Golf

dent going into Big Eight play."

But Hegarty said confident wasn't how she felt during all of the two-day competition, especially after suffering the effects of the wind during the first day.

"I played well overall, except for my third nine," she said. "It was real windy and I was not very confident."

Levin said she expects Missouri to be the favorite at the Big Eight competition, along with 1983 conference champion Nebraska. Their team is led by Cathy Nelson, who won K-State's individual medalist competition by shooting a 75.

Wolf Creek may cost $3 billion after delays

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The minority partner in the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant estimated Wednesday the project will cost $3 billion and might not be operating commercially until October 1985.

The projections differ from revised figures provided a day earlier by the utility owner overseeing plant construction and indicate a $300 million cost increase and eight-month delay from current estimates. Wolf Creek will cost $2.67 billion if it begins operation February 15, 1985, as scheduled.

Charles Ross, executive vice president of Kansas Electric Power Cooperative Inc., told the Kansas Corporation Commission that his "independent" projections indicate Wolf Creek's commercial operation date would be "sometime between late spring 1985 and late fall" — possibly mid-October 1985.

"I believe the project may go as high as $3 billion. That's my opinion," Ross said.

In addition, he said his company has made financial plans to cover potential cost increases which might result if the plant did not begin operation until as late as April 30, 1986.

KEPCo, a group of 25 rural electric cooperatives, owns six percent of the Wolf Creek plant near Burlington. Kansas Gas & Electric Co. of Wichita and Kansas City Power & Light Co. each own 47 percent.

However, KG&E disclosed new construction delays Tuesday and said the plant's cost will increase by an undetermined amount. A new cost estimate is to be released in June by the utility.

KG&E told the KCC that construction at the plant was four to six weeks behind schedule and Wolf Creek would be operating at 50 percent of its generating capacity by the end of March 1985. It would take at least 45 days before the plant would be at 100 percent power, or until about May 1985.

A spokesman for the Wichita-based utility declined to comment on the cost estimates made Wednesday by Ross.

"We gave in our testimony our best estimate. We don't have any reason at this time to want to change that," said Robert Rives, KG&E group vice president for corporate relations.

Any delay in the plant's completion would add to its total costs. KG&E says each additional month will add $25 million in financing costs and $20 million to $25 million in construction costs to the plant's pricetag.

Richard "Pete" Loux, a member of the commission, said the plant estimates made by Ross were "more candid" than ones provided Tuesday by KG&E, which he described as "iffy" and said were based on a "best case scenario."

"I've always thought it (Wolf Creek) ultimately would be about $3.3 billion," Loux said.

Ross testified about Wolf Creek for about 3½ hours before the commission, answering questions posed by a KCC staff attorney. His testimony came at the end of a case in which KEPCo asked permission to charge its member co-ops for about $855,000 in costs for leasing transmission lines owned by other utilities to deliver electrical powers to its customers.

During his remarks, Ross emphasized that his Wolf Creek projections were independent of those made by KG&E, which is the lead partner in the project, and are based upon observations of KEPCo staff members, including an engineer present at the construction site.

"I'm just telling you our best feelings on this thing," Ross said in an interview after his testimony before the KCC.

Towing proposal faces opposition of traffic council

By MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

Despite opposition by the Traffic and Parking Council, vehicles parked in reserved parking, handicapped parking or fire lanes will be towed only on an emergency basis and with the approval of Art Stone, director of the K-State Police Department, or Gene Cross, vice president for University Facilities.

In a special meeting Wednesday, the council met with Cross to discuss the change made by Cross in the policy of towing vehicles on campus. Prior to the decision announced by Cross in a letter dated March 28, any campus police officer had the authority to tow any illegally parked vehicle.

The council voted to establish a sub-committee to attempt to resolve the towing situation on campus. In the meantime, Cross' new policy will stand.

At the meeting, Cross reiterated his belief that the policy change was necessary.

"We have the latitude to implement those (parking) policies as we see fit here at the University, and that's exactly what was the intent of my letter, to do that," he said.

Cross said his letter was not intended to say that officers would not tow vehicles illegally parked.

"What we wanted to do was take the decision-making responsibility out of the field and make sure that we reviewed these (parking violations) so that we've looked at any and all other alternatives as much as possible before we get into towing, because we've had some very unfortunate circumstances," he said.

The principal problem referred to by Cross was an incident concerning a potential transfer student. The student and her parents were visiting the campus, and their car was towed from a reserved parking stall. The transfer student's parents wrote a letter to K-State President Duane Acker complaining about the incident.

Cross denied allegations that the policy was enacted because a donor to the University had complained to Acker. He said that to his knowledge, the University has not towed any "big donors." However, a KSU Foundation board member was towed a few weeks ago, he said.

Members of the council asked Cross to clarify what constitutes an emergency. The change in policy states vehicles will be towed on an emergency basis only. Council members also asked if a time lag would be created if Stone or Cross had to approve each towing.

Cross said the decision of whether a situation is an emergency would be up to the discretion of either himself or Stone. He said if Stone was not on campus, there would be an acting chief on campus to approve the tow.

"Either Chief Stone or an acting chief is on this campus at all times," he said.

Cross said the letter was written because visitors to campus should not have to deal with having their car towed, which might keep potential students from attending the University.

The council, after debating with Cross for more than an hour, decided to go on record as being opposed to the new policy because it was not decided through the council.

"It does create a lot of stress (for the council) in that your (Cross') sudden change in this area puts a lot of pressure on us to come up with alternatives. Potentially that's not the best way to go about solving the problem," said Elizabeth Edwards, council member and campus police officer.

Gunfire forces helicopter landing in Honduras

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A U.S. Army helicopter carrying Sens. Lawton Chiles, D-Fla., and J. Bennett Johnston, D-La., was struck by gunfire and forced down in Honduras near the border with El Salvador on Wednesday but no one was injured, officials said.

Shots also were fired at a second helicopter, carrying the wife of the U.S. ambassador to Honduras, according to Col. Robert O'Brien, a spokesman for the Pentagon.

None of the nine passengers and six crewmen aboard the Army UH-1 helicopters was injured, O'Brien said, and it was not known who fired the shots.

The helicopters were en route from the Honduras Air Force Base at Palmerola, Honduras, to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees Camp at Colomoncagua. The camp is the home of Salvadoran refugees, many of whom are considered sympathetic to the leftist guerrillas fighting the government of El Salvador.

The helicopter carrying the senators made a "precautionary landing" and the other helicopter landed, picked up the passengers and crew, and returned to their base, O'Brien said.

"A preliminary report indicated that the precautionary landing was made as the result of ground fire which struck the helicopter... The incident is under investigation," according to a statement issued by the U.S. Embassy in Tegucigalpa, the Honduran capital, and released in Washington.

The Pentagon said Diana Negrofonte, wife of U.S. ambassador John Negrofonte, was on the second helicopter.

The two senators later continued their fact-finding mission, heading to Panama on Wednesday night. They were scheduled to fly to Nicaragua on Thursday before returning to Washington on Friday, aides said.

"I'm not going to visit any more of those camps," Beal quoted Chiles as saying.

This was the second incident involving U.S. military helicopters in Honduras this year. On Jan. 11, a U.S. Army helicopter landed inside Honduras after taking fire from what the Pentagon claimed was Nicaraguan forces inside Nicaragua. The pilot of the helicopter was killed by a bullet after leaving his chopper. A U.S. investigator reported later that the bullet was fired by Nicaraguan soldiers from across the border. He also said "it is possible" that that helicopter had crossed from Honduras into Nicaragua before it was shot down.

American media distorts true story

By KARLA PORTER
Staff Writer

American media misrepresent the true situation in Lebanon and U.S. interests there because of a "conservative consensus" not to contest government policies, according to Aijaz Ahmad, a Rutgers University scholar and author of several works on the Middle East.

Ahmad spoke on the Middle East situation, in particular Lebanon and Israel, to more than 50 listeners Wednesday in the Union Catskeller. His speech was sponsored by the International Coordinating Council and the Iranian Student Association.

U.S. media tend to portray Lebanon as "this nice Democratic, prosperous, civilized country... whose balance has been disrupted by the Palestinians and the PLO," Ahmad said.

That image reflects the U.S. government's claims that its interest is protecting democracy there.

Ahmad said the reality is a different picture. When Lebanon, formerly a French protectorate, was granted independence from France in 1943, the French "hammered out" an unwritten constitution ship. That has been a divisive issue within Lebanese society.

A movement within Lebanon to establish a "non-confessional," secular democratic government has brought civil war in Lebanon since the 1950s as the two forces fight each other, Ahmad said. The U.S. government and media ignore the internal condition of Lebanon and concentrate on the "superpower" interests in the country, he said.

"Basically, the question of Lebanon is rarely addressed. It is seen either in the geopolitical context for superpower confrontation, Soviet Union and United States, in which Lebanon becomes a pawn, or more often in the context of Israeli-Palestinian conflict..." he said. "What gets ignored is the reality of Lebanon."

Ahmad said the conflict in Lebanon is between the forces working to establish a democratic government, led by the National Front, and the powerful minority wanting to preserve the current system. The United States, contrary to its stated purpose, supports the regime of the current Lebanese president, Amin Gemayel, who Ahmad said opposes a democratic government in his country.

Lebanon is a good U.S. "client," Ahmad said, linked with the United States through its strategic geopolitical interests and historical ties with the business elite who rule the country.

Mondale captures win in Missouri caucuses

By The Associated Press

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. — Former Vice President Walter Mondale was the victor in the Democratic Party's local caucuses in Missouri Wednesday night.

Although the results compiled by the Democratic State Committee were slow in coming, they showed Mondale outdistancing both Sen. Gary Hart and the Rev. Jesse Jackson by a wide margin.

In addition, unofficial tallies by both the Mondale campaign and supporters of Hart showed Mondale was the winner.

With 46 counties of the 114 counties reporting, Democratic Party figures showed Mondale winning 124 local delegates, Hart winning 51, Jackson with three and seven local delegates uncommitted.

State Party Chairman Pat Lea of Sikeston, who was at the party's Columbia headquarters, said even with partial results "I would call it a Mondale victory."

Wayne Koonce, a Hart spokesman said the results "were about what we expected" given Mondale's superior organization in a caucus state.

"It was the union strength basically," Koonce added.

Checks at local caucuses by the Hart campaign, which were ahead of the state party, showed Mondale winning 225 local delegates, Hart winning 116 and the Rev. Jesse Jackson winning 63, with four uncommitted.

Mondale's organization also was ahead of the party in its tabulations

Author speaks on Middle East crisis

Aijaz Ahmad

In a press conference before the speech, Ahmad said the U.S. government supports such "stable" governments without regard for the people living under the regimes.

"The basis for that stability might be terror, but it is a stable government which grants the United States its interests," he said.

Those policies are actually counter-productive. U.S. support of autocratic regimes erodes popular support in those countries for the United States, Ahmad said. A good example of the result came with the overthrow of the U.S.-backed Shah of Iran, when "suddenly the country that used to be your closest ally suddenly becomes your biggest problem."

The solution to the Lebanon problem is an international effort to supervise the withdrawal of all foreign interests from Lebanon and the disarmament of the Lebanese forces, Ahmad said.

"What (they) need is a constitutional political framework which will give equal representation not on confessional lines or sectarian lines, or lines of militia and so forth, but simply universal franchise," he said.

"If that is associated with the dismantling of the militias, then you can create a situation in which political disputes increasingly will not be settled through the gun but through that kind of a political process."

The Lebanese problem can't be solved without resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian problem, he said. More than 500,000 Palestinians live in Lebanon, most as a result of the 1948 war in which Israel became a country, and the takeover of the West Bank by Israel in 1967.

"You can't solve the problem of the Palestinians in Lebanon unless you solve the problem of Palestine on an international scale," he said.

Palestinians in Lebanon and other countries can't leave without a homeland, "somewhere to go," Ahmad said.

Theater demonstrates 'civic ambition'

(Editor's note: This is the fourth of eight articles about little-known historical sites in Kansas. "Hidden Places" is a program of University for Man and K-State's Division of Continuing Education.)

By ADAM ROME
Contributing Writer

The building is at the edge of the business district, and yet it is striking, as striking now as it was on opening night in 1907.

Classic trim of brick and stone. Entrances at left, right, and center. A tiled lobby and a richly furnished waiting room. Two sweeping staircases. Ornate columns and frescoed ceilings. Eight private boxes and two balconies. Hundreds of lights distinguished by decorative plaster, and a proscenium arch gilded in gold. A drop curtain of the painting "Napoleon at Austerlitz."

As the facade proclaims, it is "The Brown Grand," a monument to the generosity and good name of Napoleon Bonaparte Brown.

The first banker in Concordia, Brown was a mysterious and imposing figure, a man of aristocratic taste and bearing. According to historian Janet Emery, he used to drive up to the post office each day in his black phaeton, drawn by two matched and blooded horses, and command the first person he saw to fetch his mail.

He was a builder and his theater was a vaudeville, his greatest achievement.

Yet the Brown Grand also was part of the great effort of town building, a symbol of civic ambition.

At the end of the 19th century, 1,000 newly-formed communities were struggling to become the next metropolis, the next to establish the claims of greatness — towering courthouses, grand hotels, magnificent theaters.

As the editors of one of Concordia's newspapers explained in 1881, "Concordia wants and must have an opera house. Every town of any size has one, and there is no reason why Concordia does not. We must wake up or fall behind."

The work of construction was described daily in the town's newspapers, and the formal opening was reported as a thing of awe:

"In the history of every town, every city, every state," a full-page story in one paper began, "incidents take place which mark, distinctively, the beginning of a new phase of progress, the opening of another epoch in the history of the community..."

The winning of the county seat, the establishment of the Government Land Office, the coming of the railroad, the opening of the Brown Grand — this was "the foundation for a city;" this was "material for future historians to conjure with."

The theater itself was a source of amusement, "a temple of wisdom."

In the 18 years of live performance at the Brown Grand, there were dog and pony shows, wrestling and boxing matches, lectures and travelogues. There were performances by symphonies and baritones, minstrels and magicians, hypnotists and telepathists.

There were plays, musicals, "tramp shows" and spectacles — "positively producing the following startling effects," a typical playbill advertised, "electric sword duel, electric fire flies, electric flower bed, electric necklace, electric circle of fire, electric skull."

There were even a few Italian operas and a few works of Shakespeare.

But the Brown Grand also was a hope and a comfort, a chance to escape for an evening from the humdrum existence of a frontier community.

"The Brown Grand in my mind was a very, very big thing," Norman Lewis said, "because it was bringing all these very strange and rather exotic people to our comparatively small town."

The young were able here to see otherwise remote possibilities, to imagine a new life elsewhere. The middle-aged were able to experience for a moment the excitement of the city, the pleasures of high society.

At the opening, for example, the ushers wore white gloves, the firemen at the doors were in full uniform, the ladies wore gowns and flowers and diamonds and furs. "I'll tell you that night," Punch Rogers said, "society sort of quivered. It was an entirely different world."

And today? After a restoration that took six years and cost more than a half a million dollars, the Brown Grand is once more a center of performance and a symbol of community. And it is of course a place of history, a monument to dreams. Dreams of immortality. Dreams of civic greatness. Dreams of drama and passion. Dreams of life beyond the frontier. Dreams of dreams.

Vandals damage automobile

Sometime during the early morning hours of April 2, someone damaged a vehicle parked on North Eighth Street near Fremont Street in Manhattan.

The vehicle, a late model Mercury LN7, had damage to the driver's door which appeared to be made by someone kicking it numerous times. There were dents in the roof which appear to have been made by hitting it with a hammer or similar object. The sunroof and the side mirror were broken, probably by the same object.

Loss in this incident has been estimated at about $2,000.

There have been several reports of vandalism where the suspect has broken windows or kicked doors of vehicles. It is not known if these incidents are related or aimed at the individual victims.

Anyone with information on this or any other crime may call Crime Stoppers at 539-7777. Callers will remain anonymous and may qualify for cash rewards of up to $1,000.

Student contractors renovate Seaton Hall

The student chapter of the Association of Contractors of America will complete this year's portion of the facelift to Seaton Hall this week. The work includes the addition of five bulletin boards and the painting of the halls and stairways on the second floor.

The renovations began last year when bulletin boards were built in the Departments of Architectural Engineering and Construction Science.

"Last semester, we built boards for (the Department of) Civil Engineering. This semester, we did it for the agricultural engineering department," Floyd Kaster, senior in construction science and chapter member, said.

Kaster said all the work has been done by students in the chapter, which is composed of construction science majors, on weekends and some evenings.

An added incentive for the 25 students workers is the addition of a student lounge on the second floor.

"Dean (Donald) Rathbone has made allocations for buying the furniture for the lounge. We picked it out, and it should be in next week," Kaster said.

Kaster said 100 yards of fabric and 425 feet each of Selotex (a type of cork) and plywood were used to make the bulletin boards. In addition, 200 feet of birch were used as borders for the bulletin boards and 250 feet of pine was needed for the backs.

Michael Mayo, professor in architectural engineering, designed the bulletin boards for the chapter.

Horticulture conservatory gives exotic plants spot to grow

By LUCY REILLY
Collegian Reporter

In a little corner of the University, summer resides year-round.

The plant conservatory, in a greenhouse north of Throckmorton Hall, provides a sanctuary for plants from different parts of the world.

The greenhouse contains succulents and tropical plants. Hanging from the upper boughs of a tree, Spanish moss reaches for the floor. The Hawaiian state flower, the hibiscus, currently is in bloom. The fruit of the papaya hides under the shadows of plants with large fronds. The sound of falling water filters through the tropical forest, and goldfish dart around in a pond.

The conservatory was built in the 1920s southwest of Dickens Hall, where Bluemont Hall currently is located. In 1978, the structure and the majority of the plants were moved behind Throckmorton.

"When the plants were housed over near Dickens, they were in the flow of traffic. Up here (in the current location), we haven't any publicity," Michael Schnelle, senior in horticulture, said.

Schnelle, president of Pi Alpha Xi horticulture honorary, is in charge of giving conservatory tours.

"I can't understand why more people don't take tours. They could do it on their coffeebreaks, lunch hours—it's just amazing (more people don't take advantage of it)," Dawn Alford, senior in horticulture, said.

No classes use the conservatory. "A herbaceous plant material class looks at the flowers surrounding the outside of the conservatory, but not at the plants inside," Schnelle said.

The Department of Horticulture is responsible for the facility.

Pi Alpha Xi maintains the conservatory, which receives no funding from the University.

The plants require less care because they are directly in the soil, Schnelle said. Light maintenance, such as watering the plants and feeding the goldfish, is done by Tom Slagle, agriculture technician, and Linda Kaff, horticulturist.

Part of the initiation process of Pi Alpha Xi is a conservatory cleanup, which was held in March and consisted of thinning out the plants, eliminating unhealthy plants and general cleaning of the area.

During the winter months, five heaters are used to keep the temperature constant. Chilling can cause death, especially to the tropical plants, if outdoor temperatures plummet into the 40s.

Summer can be just as deadly. The glass-encased house must be white-washed to filter out the strong sunlight. The whitewash comes off naturally in the fall.

"The days are shorter and the sun gives off less foot candles (intensity) in the fall. We can let the whitewash wear off naturally if it does so sufficiently," Schnelle said.

"The white-wash is more aesthetic than if we were to cover the roof in a cloth," he said, adding that maintaining a healthy environment for the plants is "an intricate process; everything has to be balanced."

The glass of the rafters is encased in squares of wood. To prevent deterioration, the wood must be painted every year or two. The rafters in the cactus section of the room are currently being painted.

"It's such a long process because we have to clean the wood before we paint it," Alford said.

A bougainvillea, which is a pink, leafy plant resembling a small tree, commands attention in the cactus section. The plant has been trained with a process called "bonsai," which means underpotting a plant, causing it to have a dwarfed and twisted trunk. The effect of this on the bougainvillea makes it resemble a small cypress tree.

Schnelle told a story he had heard about a professor named Keen, who used to work at the University. Keen was the original owner of this particular bougainvillea, and a few years ago, it was stolen from his house. The plant was found two years later when it was discovered by police in a drug raid in Topeka.

"It shows that all walks of life are interested in plants," Schnelle said.

Michael Schnelle, senior in horticulture, stands among some of the tropical plants housed in the plant conservatory. Schnelle is responsible for conducting tours through the greenhouse behind Throckmorton Hall. Pi Alpha Xi, a horticulture honorary of which Schnelle is president, maintains the facility.

Plants such as those in the conservatory provide more than beauty. They also provide economic uses. Some are edible, such as the citrus fruits, figs and papaya.

"An enzyme (papain) found in the papaya is used to clean soft contact lenses," Schnelle said.

The vinca plant contains an extract for use in treating certain cancers. "I'm convinced that a lot of these plants are going to cure a lot of our medical problems," he said.

The conservatory can serve as an educational experience.

"It shows people how we bring plants from all over the world and grow them," Schnelle said.

Donations of insect-free plants are accepted.

Cross ignores safety measures

A letter dated March 28 from Gene Cross, vice president for University Facilities, to Art Stone, director of the K-State Police Department, announced that vehicles illegally parked in reserved stalls, handicapped parking spaces and fire lanes cannot be towed without the approval of Cross or Stone and on an emergency basis only.

The Traffic and Parking Council, in response to the proposal, plans to recommend the towing policy remain as now written in the Traffic and Parking Regulations for 1983-1984.

The current policy provides that a vehicle illegally parked in a reserved stall can be towed if the renter of the stall notifies campus police. A wheel lock would be placed on a car illegally parked in a handicapped stall, instead of towing the car, only if the car lacks proper handicap identification and there is evidence the car is driven by a handicapped person.

Cross didn't consult the Traffic and Parking Council before he changed the current towing policy. He just changed the policy.

Why? Apparently campus police, following regulations set up in the Traffic and Parking Regulations Handbook for 1983-1984, recently towed several vehicles illegally parked on campus. The vehicles were owned by "high donors to the University," according to Stone. Cross said Wednesday that no donors' cars were towed, but a car driven by a potential transfer student and her parents was towed because it was illegally parked.

Following the alleged objections of these donors and after receiving pressure from K-State President Duane Acker, Cross made the towing policy change. Obviously to Acker and Cross, the complaints of such a small but valuable group merited an immediate change in University traffic and parking policy.

Perhaps a definition is needed for what constitutes a "high donor to the University?"

Each student pays at least $550.50 each semester and out-of-state students pay $1,340.50 per semester — a substantial source of revenue for the University. Yet it is doubtful that student complaints of towing would result in such an immediate and far-reaching policy alteration.

The Traffic and Parking Council is a faculty, staff and student organization which must consider the entire University when making campus parking regulations. Its rules should not be ignored simply because an isolated group of individuals was inconvenienced.

Most disturbing is the apparent lack of consideration for safety exhibited by policy change. Parking is illegal in fire lanes and handicapped reserved stalls for specific reasons. Allowing some individuals the right to disregard public safety laws demonstrates the University's priorities. Public safety and easy access for the handicapped should be more of a priority for the vice president of University Facilities.

University must quiet greeks

Local officials should be commended for getting tough with the K-State greek system over noise and other problems.

These officials took time to sit down with representatives of the greek system Tuesday and lay the cards on the table: the University should take a more active role in keeping complaints to a minimum.

Somebody has needed to tell the University its responsibilities in this area for a long time. The Greek Affairs office has served as more of a surrogate defense lawyer than an advisory agency in the recent past, and it is time this is recognized and put aside once and for all.

But while the University needs to help local court, law enforcement and legislative officials with the greek problem, care must be taken to ensure that administering punishment, when necessary, is not left entirely to the Panhellenic and Interfraternity councils.

The University openly endorses participation in greek organizations in literature distributed to new students.

Greek judicial proceedings, much like University judicial boards, are closed to the public. Although greek organizations are private entities and have some rights to keep their dirty laundry under wraps, these disturbances affect many residents in the University area, and cases should be subject to full public scrutiny if laws are violated.

Subjecting a few students to the lukewarm wrath of the greek system while other off-campus students face real-life prosecution would be grossly unfair. Greeks should not be allowed to float above the laws all must obey.

The groundwork laid Tuesday is sound, especially the proposal by Riley County Police Department Director Alvan Johnson that University administrators be notified of complaints against greek houses. That foundation would be strengthened, however, if a system of "supplemental justice" could be adopted. The greek system could review a case and decide on its form of punishment, but only after the case reaches court.

Maybe after a few of the less-responsible greek houses pay the price for the unacceptable behavior of their members, the entire system will get the message and this foolishness will stop.

Article questions U.S. involvement

WASHINGTON — For five weeks last winter, Allan Nairn risked his life collecting interviews from current and former members of El Salvador's internal security forces. The result is not only a gruesome profile of the Salvadoran death squads, but also evidence of an extensive U.S. role in their birth and ongoing activities.

Nairn's story, which appears in the May issue of The Progressive, points out the disingenuousness of Reagan administration criticism of death squad atrocities. It adds insight, moreover, to the recent debate over America's covert war against Nicaragua.

Nairn traces U.S. support for the death squads back to the early 1960s, when, with help from the CIA, the chief Salvadoran paramilitary organization, ORDEN, was born.

In interviews, members of the security forces admit receiving training in torture techniques and other advice from the United States, in violation of the 1974 Foreign Assistance Act, which forbids the United States from helping foreign police personnel. (The administration would like to eliminate the restriction.)

Nairn learned, in fact, that at least 10 members of the security forces were scheduled to undergo a training course overseen by CIA personnel in the United States this spring.

MAXWELL GLEN & CODY SHEARER

Such intensive cooperation leads one to wonder about recent public denunciations of alleged death squad organizers by Vice President Bush and other American officials. As Nairn says now, the United States is only going after the "bad apples" and "sacrificing a few individuals to save the system" it helped create.

Illegal support for foreign police forces also falls in line with an administration given to disregarding the law elsewhere in Central America, as in the mining of Nicaraguan ports.

Last week, the Senate denounced the administration's recent terrorist efforts as if it had never supported them in the past. Of course, Congress has virtually mothered with taxpayer dollars the Nicaraguan rebels who are doing the administration's dirty work.

That sort of hypocrisy may be evident in our official attitude toward the death squads. If we're providing El Salvador's security forces with the tools to terrorize civilians, how serious can our concern be?

Since the 1981 tax act lowered the maximum rate on personal income to 50 percent, Americans making $500,000 or more have reduced their charitable contributions by 30 percent.

Warning: Watch those "war tax" deductions on your 1983 income tax forms. Since 1982, the Internal Revenue Service has assessed 5,528 taxpayers $500 each for filing protest or otherwise frivolous returns.

Kennedy-haters will receive their fill with "The Kennedys: An American Drama," which is to be published next month by Summit Books. In the book, authors David Horowitz and Peter Collier allege that family members, including parents, did little to help several Kennedy kids kick their drug addictions. However, counters one buddy of Robert Kennedy Jr., recently convicted and sentenced for heroin possession, "The book ignores and overlooks dozens and dozens of efforts by friends and family members to help Bobby and David (Kennedy) get off drugs."

Cross errs with new parking, towing policy

Editor,
Re: "Conflicts arise with new policy for auto towing," in the April 17 Collegian:

This article brought to light some issues, which, if reported accurately, cannot be overlooked without comment. The article stated that high donors to the University who parked illegally, and were towed as a result, complained to the University president.

The president directed Vice President for University Facilities Gene Cross to remedy the problem. Cross, without consulting the University Parking and Traffic Council, instituted his own policy regarding the towing of vehicles. The new policy indicated towing would be limited to emergency situations and then only with the approval of Cross or Art Stone, director of the K-State Police Department.

This policy and its institution has three main flaws. First, who allocates Cross authority to concoct and implement such far-reaching policies without prior council consultation?

Second, in theory, a rule or regulation is meant to be all-inclusive. Who is to obey the regulation is not to be determined by race, sex, age and, by implication, not by financial status.

A donation to the University should not ensure a person the right of legally evading a regulation or preferential treatment concerning the penalty of breaking the rule. In other words, a wealthy checkbook should not be a permit to park in handicap spaces or fire lanes.

And third, the policy itself is ridiculous. By "emergency situation," I wonder if Cross means a fire truck has arrived to put out a fire and can't reach the hydrant, a handicapped person has been forced to miss class or, more likely, the illegally parked car has been safely determined to belong to a nobody with empty pockets.

I can only hope this prejudiced, simple-minded mentality has no participation in the formation of other policies at K-State, a University that can normally pride itself on equality for all.

Student says hazing story 'unprofessional'

Editor:
Re: "Dubious hazing elicits complaint from 3 little sisters," in the April 18 Collegian:

Wednesday's edition of the Collegian proved only one thing to me — the Collegian is a training ground for journalism hopefuls. Their unprofessional attempt to bring information to the campus community was littered with biases and half-truths.

When the "hazing" of the Sigma Phi Epsilon little sisters was reported nearly a month ago, I can hardly see the timeliness of running the story now. And furthermore, its making the front page is an act of sensationalism which every Reporting I student learns.

After reading the article, it was obvious to this reader that the staff reporters were singling out this particular fraternity. Personal prejudices have no place in the newsroom, not to mention print.

There is no excuse to turn an opportunity for a good investigative story into muckraking, which supposedly went out in the 19th century. The Sig Ep house is surely not the only fraternity at K-State to have individuals overstep the bounds to a certain extent. There were several mentions about this happening in other organizations as well. This provided the Collegian the means to investigate other little sister organizations and their practices. But this idea was rejected and the story was used as a means of "making an example" of this one fraternity.

I fail to see the relevancy of printing such a story without also acknowledging the fact that the Goldenheart little sister program has been extremely active in the past with an unblemished record until three women chose to make a federal case out of a few isolated incidents.

I would also like to point out that nothing has ever been printed about the whole fraternal system concerning this matter. Instead, the Collegian elected to discredit the Sig Eps who have time and time again been leaders in K-State's greek system.

I can only hope that in the future the Collegian will stop its abuse of the greek organizations and show them in their true light as students growing and learning in this community.

Radio format allows little time for requests

Editor,
Re: Johnny Dix's letter, "Radio DJs unresponsive to song requests," in the April 18 Collegian:

I have been a disc jockey and have realized the frustration of a listener who did not get to hear his or her request played. There are reasons for this. A radio station is programmed to play a certain amount of current hits, recurrent hits, oldies, commercials, public service announcements and news, weather and sports, depending on the station.

I doubt that anyone can find an all-request radio station. With all that goes into one hour of a radio station's format, there usually isn't a lot of time left to play a request.

Dix was curious if the disc jockey would be in violation of any FCC rules and regulations if he did not play a request. Definitely not. There is no law that says his request has to be played.

Another interesting thing about Dix's letter was his claim that he tried to request a song or artist until 2:12 a.m. I find this very amusing, especially when he made the request to a "local" station.

There are three radio stations in town that will play the Eagles or anything along that line: KMKF-FM, KSDB-FM and KJCK-FM. Making a request to these stations is impossible at 2:12 a.m. on the day Dix apparently tried. KMKF is automated and requests are not played by the computer. KSDB is off the air at 1 a.m., and KJCK broadcasts a network program called "Night-time America" out of New York City.

I'm not sure what local station Dix tried to get to play his request, but at 2:12 a.m., it's not in Manhattan or Junction City.

Song selection often limited

Editor,
Re: Johnny Dix's letter, "Radio DJs unresponsive to song requests," in the April 18 Collegian:

The staff at KSDB-FM (88.1) would like to remind Dix that not all radio stations are a "computer setup with pre-programmed songs."

KSDB-FM consists of live DJs that take requests within our new album rock format, jazz in the morning, and other specialty shows. KSDB also runs all requests from midnight to 1 a.m. Sunday through Friday and 11 p.m. to 1 a.m. on Saturdays. Of course, if a song or artist was played earlier, there is no sense in airing the song again for one individual while other listeners listen to it for a second time. Radio stations aren't personal juke boxes.

Although it isn't clear what radio station Dix is referring to, we would like to point out that he shouldn't rely on hearing his song played. Very often the station doesn't have the album, it may not fit the format or the DJ may have requests ahead of his.

KSDB does its best to serve its listeners and be a learning instrument at the same time, and does both quite well. If Dix has something he'd like to hear, maybe we can help him out at 532-6960.

Group proposes plans to beautify city

By LEE WHITE
Manhattan Editor

Some community leaders think Manhattan needs to improve the image visitors receive of the city. And while the long-range proposals are still several years from completion, the short-term remedy will begin in less than 10 days.

About 20 city officials, business people and members of the Chamber of Commerce's Community Improvement Committee met Wednesday night at the chamber office to discuss two methods of improving the city's image.

One of these methods starts April 28 and continues through May 6. Manhattan Clean and Green Week, the brainchild of the improvement committee, is designed to encourage residents to look for ways to improve the appearance of their property, City Commissioner Rick Mann said.

"Our purpose here is we're leading up to graduation," he said. "A lot of people will be coming into town who have spent a lot of money on their children's education. This will be the first and last impression of Manhattan for some of those people."

The committee plans to sponsor two Clean and Green Weeks each year, one in the spring and another in the fall, Mann said. The fall event may be conducted the week before Homecoming when more people than usual visit the city.

Clean and Green Week will coincide with the city's clean-up program, which is to be held from April 30 to May 4 in conjunction with National Beautification Week.

Performing spring cleaning and repairs isn't the only plan in the works for making Manhattan beautiful. The committee and others are looking toward improving the main highway entrances to the city and are using a visual study by a group of K-State landscape architecture students to do it.

The study, first presented publicly in December, shows the positive and negative aspects of the five major entrances and suggests ways these might be improved.

The study proposes better "screening" of structures that don't blend in with the natural landscape of the entrances. This could be accomplished by tree planting or, in a few cases, removal of unsightly structures.

Bill Sullivan, graduate in landscape architecture, narrated the slide presentation to the group and said visitors approaching the city from the north and east on Kansas Highway 24 and the west on K-18 need to be given better directions to the business district and the University by signs.

Local officials are considering a comprehensive land use plan for the Manhattan area, and Sullivan said he hopes the students' study can be incorporated into that plan.

Mann and Sullivan said they want to improve the entrances while still allowing growth of businesses lining the routes.

"We want you to begin thinking," Mann told the group. "Much of this plan depends on public input. I like to stress voluntary cooperation."

Professor shoots self after tenure refusal

By The Associated Press

COLUMBIA, S.C. — A former teacher of the year at the University of South Carolina who was denied tenure shot and killed himself Wednesday after taking a student hostage, authorities said.

Philip Zeltner, 37, a former assistant philosophy professor, shot himself in the head in the office of the university's president, where he had barricaded himself after seizing a student who was later released, said Hugh Munn, spokesman for the State Law Enforcement Division.

Zeltner was found about 5:30 p.m. by a SWAT team that apparently picked the lock of the door to university President James Holderman's office in the administration building, Munn said.

"He apparently shot himself with one of the two handguns he had," Munn said.

Zeltner, who arrived at the university in 1973, was named the school's teacher of the year in 1978 but later was denied tenure. He had filed a lawsuit against the university.

Zeltner entered Holderman's second-floor office shortly after 1 p.m., demanding to see Holderman, Munn said.

When told Holderman wasn't there, Zeltner took the student hostage, Munn said, and USC security officials evacuated and sealed off the building about 1:30 p.m.

Zeltner talked by telephone with Holderman, agents of the State Law Enforcement Division and a television personality, but hung up and was dead within a half hour, Munn said.

Jobless family 'fishes' to reside in park

By The Associated Press

CHICAGO — Bill Grove and his wife and young son are broke, but they woke up Wednesday morning with the kind of view of Lake Michigan and the city's magnificent skyline that costs some of their neighbors $1,000 a month.

They also were cold and wet — but proud.

The family, with nowhere else to go, pitched a tent in a public park that allows fishermen to set up shelters. Just to make it legal, Grove tosses a baitless fishing line into the lake every few hours.

"I've never been on welfare, and I'm not about to be now," said Grove, 25, who is out of work. While their 6-by-6-foot canvas home has its drawbacks, he said, "This beats sitting down there in the Department of Human Services."

Grove, his wife, Barbara, and their 9-year-old son, Sid, lunched Tuesday on tortillas and peanut butter. Supper was a can of pork and beans.

"We were cold and starved last night," Grove said, "but today looks like a better story."

He was referring to donations of money and food and offers of apartments and jobs from people who read about the family's plight in the Chicago Tribune.

"People just come by, many of them won't even say their name or anything, and offer to help," Grove said.

He said the family had received "a few hundred dollars...and more food than we can eat in a week — and it's still coming."

"I never expected it. I didn't ask for it. But I'm grateful," he said, adding that his wife and son were looking forward to spending Wednesday night in "a cheap hotel where we can shower and have a hot meal — the first since Sunday."

For two days, the family had camped just beyond the waves of Montrose Harbor on the city's North Side. Two nights before that, he said, they stayed at a campground near Kankakee and the Indiana border.

Until last week, the family stayed with relatives. Grove said they moved out when his brother-in-law became ill.

"I called the Park District, and they said as long as we were fishing and weren't permanent, we could pitch our tent," he said.

In order to "go by the book,"

Grove was showing his line out where trout and salmon are biting. No luck though; fish do not usually bite on empty hooks.

Grove, a former quality control worker, has been out of full-time work since June. He said his most recent part-time job was cutting Christmas trees in Michigan's Upper Peninsula.

He said he planned to take an apartment that had been offered in exchange for "a little work around the place," and would consider the recent job offers, one of which was selling matches.

Reagan leaves today on China trip

WASHINGTON — President Reagan embarks today on the first leg of an 11,000-mile journey to China, hoping to establish a "stable, enduring and comprehensive" relationship with the world's most populous nation.

But Secretary of State George P. Shultz said the possibility that Reagan and the Chinese leaders would sign a nuclear power agreement remains uncertain.

The president and top Chinese officials scheduled seven hours of meetings, which Shultz told reporters Wednesday would amount to "a very full agenda."

Reagan's journey to Peking will take seven days to complete. His first stop is Tacoma, Wash., this afternoon, for a meeting with timber industry officials.

The president will spend the rest of the week at his ranch northwest of Santa Barbara, Calif., and will fly to Honolulu on Easter Sunday. After two days in Honolulu, he will fly to Guam and eventually reach Peking on April 26.

By spreading out the travel, the 73-year-old president will have several days to adjust to the 13-hour time difference between Washington and Peking.

The trip will be Reagan's first to a communist nation, and the third by a U.S. president to China, while in office. Richard M. Nixon visited China in 1972 and Gerald R. Ford made the trip in 1975.

Regents official to head college

TOPEKA — Joe McFarland, director of academic affairs for the Kansas Board of Regents the past 14 years, has been named president of Geneva College in Beaver Falls, Pa., effective July 1, the school announced.

McFarland, who will become the 17th president in the 136-year history of the liberal arts college, which is affiliated with the Reformed Presbyterian Church of North America, has been a member of its board of trustees since 1973.

McFarland worked in Reno County public schools for six years and was superintendent of schools at Turon, then was a professor of education at Emporia State University for nine years and was associate executive secretary of Kansas-National Education Association for four years before joining the Board of Regents' staff in 1970.

Probation given in Cargill case

WICHITA — Daniel Helmer, 47, of Augusta, was placed on five years probation Wednesday for his part in a scheme to defraud agribusiness giant Cargill Inc. by faking soybean deliveries.

Helmer pleaded no contest in March to charges of theft and making a false writing. He agreed to make restitution to Cargill for thefts between March and May 1983. Helmer said in court Wednesday he had been involved in the fraud scheme for about two years. Assistant District Attorney Richard Ballinger said Cargill is seeking restitution from Helmer and others in a separate federal civil lawsuit.

In exchange for Helmer's plea to two consolidated counts, prosecutors agreed to dismiss 15 other counts that had been filed against him.

Sedgwick County District Judge Paul Clark fined Helmer $5,000 and issued a stern warning.

"If you get back, in any way whatsoever, into such activities, my end of this bargain will be I'll send you to the penitentiary for as long as I possibly can," the judge said during Helmer's sentencing Wednesday.

Ambassador set free after 24 hours

Libyans end siege of British Embassy

By The Associated Press

LONDON — Libya lifted its siege of the British Embassy in Tripoli on Wednesday, the Foreign Office said, but British sharpshooters in London kept their rifles trained on the Libyan mission from which a gunman attacked peaceful protesters.

A Foreign Office spokesman said British Ambassador Oliver Miles and 24 other Britons were given permission to leave the embassy in Tripoli on Wednesday afternoon after being trapped inside for more than 24 hours.

"We welcome this," the spokesman said, who spoke on condition he not be named. He said an unspecified number of those inside the embassy had left and that Libyan guards were still outside the embassy.

In London, police released without charge four Libyans who were detained Tuesday after a gunman sprayed submachine-gun fire from an upstairs embassy window on exiles demonstrating against Libyan leader Col. Moammar Khadafy. A British policewoman was killed and 11 protesters were wounded.

ABC-TV News in New York reported on Wednesday night that U.S. intelligence sources told it that shortly before the protest, an American spy satellite had intercepted a radio message from the Libyan government telling the embassy in London to use force in responding to the demonstrators.

"The U.S. government warned British authorities, but by the time British authorities could respond, shots had been fired," the network said without naming the sources.

State Department spokesman Brian Carlson said in Washington he had no comment on the report.

On Wednesday, for the first time in the two-day standoff, a Libyan diplomat left the building and went to the Foreign Office on Wednesday. Muftah Fitouri, from the embassy's political section, spent 40 minutes with the minister of state, Richard Luce.

Luce reiterated Britain's demand that the diplomats and revolutionary students holed up in the five-story Georgian building should leave it, the Foreign Office spokesman said.

Muftah, the spokesman said, returned to the embassy in London's elegant St. James' Square to confer with Khadafy's administration.

Police sent Arab-style meals into the embassy Wednesday, and nearby buildings were evacuated. Armed police were seen moving across the roof of the surrounding structures and the embassy itself, believed to still house the gunman.

Scotland Yard spokesman John Miller said sporadic negotiations were conducted by telephone with those inside the embassy.

Earlier in Tripoli, the Libyan capital, Ambassador Miles had been escorted by armed guards to see the Libyan foreign minister. Miles later returned to the embassy.

Britain's Foreign Office said Libya also lifted a siege around the ambassador's residence, where Miles' wife, Julia, remained with their four children.

Three non-diplomats who were arrested in apparent revenge for the London siege remained in custody, and Miles was "doing his best" to win their freedom, the Foreign Office spokesman said.

Luce said the Libyans inside the London embassy, known as the People's Bureau, had "expressed regret" about the killing of policewoman Yvonne Fletcher, 25.

But there was no formal apology — and the Libyan Foreign Ministry and state radio, which have charged that British police attacked the embassy, poured out anti-British rhetoric.

Tripoli Radio, monitored in London, claimed the shooting started after police and demonstrators attacked the embassy — a version contradicted by witnesses and videotapes.

Five senior Cabinet ministers in the Conservative government formed a crisis committee, conferred and stipulated the siege should continue, sources said, who spoke on condition they not be named.

"We ask them (the Libyans) to come out peacefully and thus enable us to go in and search for weapons and explosives. We are doing our utmost to resolve the problem peacefully," Luce said.

Under international conventions, the embassy is considered Libyan territory and the Libyans inside have claimed diplomatic immunity. British officials noted that four members of a "students' committee" running the embassy were never officially listed as embassy personnel, making their claim of immunity questionable.

There was no sign that Britain would bow to Libya's demands for lifting the embassy siege and promise never to allow exiles to demonstrate against Khadafy.

Four Libyans, arrested after a spate of bombings in London and Manchester last year, remained in jail facing criminal charges. One made a brief appearance in a Manchester court under heavy guard Wednesday.

In New York, a spokesman for U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar said the U.N. official was considering a Libyan request that he persuade Britain to end the embassy standoff.

Computer test may guide students to appropriate careers

By DAVID BEVENS
Staff Writer

VISA is being offered through the Career Planning and Placement Center and U-Learn, but it is not a credit account requiring a plastic card.

K-State's version of VISA is new form of occupation test on a computer program which serves as an aid to students who are dissatisfied with or undecided on their major. It requires an average of 25 minutes of a student's time to take the test.

Vocational Images from Selected Activities (VISA), which was formed two weeks ago, is the brainchild of David Blankenship, temporary instructor for student development. The occupational test is based on how a person perceives a specific occupation rather than simply answering "yes" or "no" to specific occupational titles, he said.

"The program makes you think. It's like, 'Why would I say no, or why would I say yes' to a specific occupation," he said. Blankenship said past occupational testing was designed for finding the "perfect job."

"There are programs to bring people to converge on jobs. I see this as a program that will diverge on jobs," he said.

People are capable of doing several different types of jobs, and there are many common characteristics in all jobs, he said.

"In some ways, there is no way to be clear off-base," Blankenship said of students using the system to help in making a career choice.

The system lists a total of 24 occupations. For each occupation there are six activity descriptors or stems given. The student rates each activity stem for how typical that activity is in that occupation.

After the student rates all six activities, the program ranks them from most to least typical based on what the student has indicated. If the student agrees with the ordering of characteristics, he moves on to the next occupation. If not, the student may rearrange his ordering of the stems and the computer again responds. The computer then asks the student if he would like that occupation based on the way he has ranked the characteristics.

By gauging the responses, the career counselor can determine which activities are most important to the student. This information is combined with information about the student's talents and interests to help him make career choices.

"This combines what people are looking for to come up with a certain kind of job," he said.

"I think we have the theory base, the technique and as we add technology, it is a very good synthesis. In some ways, I'm exploiting the way the computer can interact with someone," Blankenship said.

Computers in the past have replaced manual tasks. Using computers as an interaction process for finding a job is something new in career counseling, he said.

"Oddly enough, it seems to be brand-new ground," Blankenship said. Last November, Blankenship ran a search in Farrell Library for other programs and research on his particular program. No information was discovered, he said.

Blankenship said he hopes that in the future the test will be used at other universities. It would then be possible to examine the results gathered from other universities and analyze the differences, he said.

Blankenship said he hopes the test will eventually replace other sex-biased occupational tests. A second long-term goal is that the test will prove useful for 20-year-olds who are frustrated in finding a career field that interests them, he said.

"At this stage, I wouldn't claim these instruments would do these things. It's in a development stage. It shows real promise," he said.

Law may prevent computer 'hacking'...

By The College Press Service

WASHINGTON — Precisely because they are learning tools, campus computer systems are easy, big targets for computer hackers attempting to break into information and files, a college president told a congressional committee debating a law to make hacking a federal crime.

"Academic computers are the most permeable because they are there for that purpose: access,"

Drake University President Wilbur Miller testified to the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime last week.

But making college computers less user-friendly and more secure limits their use as learning tools, he said.

Miller said he supports the subcommittee's proposal to make it a federal crime to illegally tap computer files worth more than $5,000.

He said that last January a university student worked with a local television station to show how easily the Iowa campus's computer security could be breached.

Although no damage was done, Drake had to shut its system down for several days to verify all its records were intact, Miller told the subcommittee.

Shutdowns — and the security necessary to prevent them — hinder everyone's education, he said.

"What has in large part been viewed as intellectual pranksterism on the part of computer hackers must be viewed as a serious intrusion on the rights of individuals to pursue the enterprise of their education in an accessible environment," he said.

Twenty-three states already have laws making computer entry without permission a crime, but no federal law yet exists.

The bill Miller favors makes it a crime to do more than $5,000 damage to computers or computer files, including the cost of lost computer time.

U.S. proposes ban on chemical warfare

By The Associated Press

GENEVA, Switzerland — The United States on Wednesday proposed a new treaty banning chemical weapons and Vice President George Bush told the Geneva Disarmament Conference it would eliminate "the possibility of chemical warfare forever."

In an address to the 40-nation conference, Bush said the 66-page draft provisions are "indispensable to an effective treaty" and urged the Soviet Union and other countries to adopt "open invitation" provisions allowing on-site inspections of chemical weapons facilities any time, anywhere.

"The goal of our proposal is a treaty to require states to declare the sizes and locations of their chemical weapons stocks and production facilities, to destroy the stocks and facilities and to forswear creating new chemical weapons," the vice president said.

In the first direct response to the full U.S. proposal, Victor Issraelyan, the chief Soviet delegate, said it would be studied "like any other paper," but then seemed to link it to the U.S.-Soviet negotiations on medium- and long-range missiles that collapsed here last year.

On Tuesday, Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko seemed to reject the chemical proposal as a cover for building up U.S. chemical arms.

...Students abuse computer access regulations

A remote computer terminal, unattended and privately situated, offers a privacy which may invite abuses.

These words from a K-State Computing Center pamphlet about the use of K-State computing services are proving true.

The center's security consists of individual student account numbers and pass words required for computer entry.

Tom Gallagher, computing center director, said a case is currently pending in court concerning two students who violated these guidelines by stealing other people's account numbers and using them to gain unauthorized information.

Gallagher said the punishment is prosecution and the county attorney is working on the case.

He said user responsibility is the only ultimate safeguard against misuse of campus computers.

The policies state that users should apply standards of normal academic ethics, respect of privacy and polite conduct to their use of the computing services.

The guidelines recommend that users not change cataloged procedures or modify catalog entries. It also is recommended that users not pry into data or other information contained in the system. If a program or procedure is used or read without permission of its owner, it is equivalent to plagiarism and the invasion of privacy.

Computing center account numbers and other data required for access to computing services are to be used for the purposes of accurate accountability, are non-transferable and are to be used only for the projects given in the application for such services.

"Hopefully, through the University Digital Computer Committee, we can come up with a greater degree of specificity in these responsibilities," Gallagher said. The committee is a policy committee for academic computing which strives to better define the responsibilities of use and misuse of academic computers, he said.

The Computing Center has been open for 20 years and has never had to be shut down due to break-ins, he said.

Kathy Gillpatrick winds up to throw the ball to a University of Kansas batter in the third inning of K-State's 9-0 first-game loss Wednesday. K-State won the second game of the doubleheader 4-0.

Royals fall to Tigers

By The Associated Press

DETROIT — Alan Trammell scored the winning run from third when Kansas City second baseman Frank White bobbled Larry Herndon's two-out grounder in the 10th inning, giving the undefeated Detroit Tigers a 4-3 victory over the Kansas City Royals Wednesday night.

Trammell led off the Detroit 10th with a single through the box and took second on Dave Bergman's sacrifice bunt. He moved to third on a grounder by Lance Parrish and scored when White bobbled Herndon's routine grounder. White tried twice to find the handle of the ball before falling on his seat.

Trailing 3-0, the Royals tied the game in the eighth on Jorge Orta's three-run homer that shattered Morris' streak of 28 1-3 consecutive innings without allowing an earned run.

Knight puts basketball trials in order

By The Associated Press

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — Former Olympic basketball coaches Hank Iba and Pete Newell agreed Wednesday that U.S. coach Bobby Knight has everything in order in the quest for the gold medal at the Summer Games.

"I don't think we've ever had a better process in developing and selecting an Olympic team than we have now," said Newell, coach of the 1960 gold medal team.

Iba, who coached Olympic teams in 1964, 1968 and 1972, added, "The organization of the trials here is about the best I've ever (been) around and these people are well-organized, a great group of coaches working, a fine group of athletes, and I'm sure the selection committee will come on later and give to you the best Olympic team."

Along with the late Clair Bee, Knight included Newell, a former University of San Francisco and pro coach and Iba, the former Oklahoma State coach, as "three great innovative people that really set things up in such a way the rest come along and copy to a great extent what they have done."

Knight, Newell and Iba spoke at a news conference after Knight and his staff guided 72 invitees through the second day of Olympic trials, morning and afternoon practice sessions and night scrimmage games.

The hopefuls are more than twice the number ever invited to an Olympic trial at Indiana University, where Knight has more than 20 college coaches working with him.

"This is an outstanding crop," Newell said. "The junior crop on the college level is maybe as good a crop of one-class players as I've ever seen since 1960, maybe as good as 1960."

That 1960 team was led by Oscar Robertson and Jerry West.

Kaufmann to launch drug program

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The owner of the Kansas City Royals, stung last year by a drug problem on his ballclub, announced plans Wednesday to launch a drug abuse awareness campaign aimed at elementary and junior high school pupils in the Kansas City area.

"Six months ago the problem hit home for me," Kauffman said at a news conference. "We made a commitment to do something about it. Anyone concerned about the vitality of the community must recognize the pressures and dangers that youth face today."

Details of the program have not been worked out, but Kauffman called it an education and awareness program primarily for pupils in the fifth through 10th grades with a primary emphasis on junior high school pupils. He said it may be the most positive vehicle to prevent young people from abusing drugs.

Kauffman promised in December to start some type of drug awareness program. He and his wife, Muriel, announced plans for the program Wednesday at the offices of Marion Laboratories, the pharmaceutical company Kauffman founded. He said the program will be financed by his family and the Kauffman foundation "for years."

He said the program will use resources of his company, the Royals organization, other social service agencies in the area, community mental health agencies, hospitals and alcohol and drug abuse agencies.

KU pitcher throws no-hitter

University of Kansas pitcher Tracy Bunge threw a no-hitter against K-State in the opening game of a double-header Wednesday at City Park and the Jayhawks coasted to a 9-0 victory. Kansas won the second game, 4-0.

Bunge, an all-Big Eight Conference pick last season, struck out seven in the five-inning contest.

"She's a real good chucker," K-State Softball Coach Ralph Currie said. "And in the second game she played first base, and she plays that like a pro."

The Wildcats only scoring opportunity came in the first inning. Sherri Chace reached first base on an error and advanced to second on a passed ball. Bunge fanned Rachelle Borders for the second out of the inning. Chace stole third and Joyce Hawley drew a walk. But Bunge struck out Annette Kirkham to end the inning.

The Jayhawks scored one run in the second inning, three in the third, two in the fourth and three in the fifth. Bunge and Kelly Downs had two hits each for the winners, who banged out nine total.

In the second game, K-State's Lisa

Tarvestad, in her first starting assignment against Big Eight competition, threw no-hit ball for four innings before the Jayhawks broke through with a run and two hits in the fifth. Kansas then scored two in the sixth and one run in the seventh inning.

"She pitched a real good game," Currie said. "They got two runs when the ball went through a hole in the fence (backstop), and that hurt."

"She pitched a real intelligent game. She did a good job of moving the ball around," he said. "And the girls are gaining confidence with Lisa on the mound, which will help."

The Wildcats will need that extra confidence this weekend when they host Oklahoma State University and the University of Nebraska in a three-team tournament.

The Cowboys and Cornhuskers are tied for the conference lead with 6-2 records.

"It's going to be rough," Currie said. "Oklahoma State has a real good pitcher, Dale Munn, who throws really hard."

Munn was 18-7 and an all-Big Eight pick last season. Her ERA was .550, and she struck out 193 batters in 195 innings.

"We've had good luck against Nebraska in the past," Currie said. "I think we might be able to sneak up on somebody if we get some good pitching."

K-State is scheduled to play in the tournament at 11 a.m. and 3 p.m. Saturday and Sunday at Cio Park.

Colleges work toward toughening student conduct codes

By The College Press Service

SPRINGFIELD, Mo. — Southwest Missouri State University senior Jim McWilliams got a big surprise several weeks ago when campus security officers abruptly cornered him and announced they were charging him with a crime.

The crime: he had helped a friend distribute "The Southwest Rag," an offbeat paper the campus officials claim contained defamatory and obscene remarks about administrators and students.

While the McWilliams case might be an extreme example of how administrators on many campuses are moving aggressively to control student behavior more closely than any time since the early 1960s, it is far from the only one.

Last week, for instance, administrators at the nine-campus University of Florida system announced they are considering toughening their student conduct code.

In recent months, colleges have gone to court to try to reinforce their rights to punish and suspend students, invalidate diplomas, withhold transcripts and impose disciplinary penalties without providing students with the same due process they would get in public courts.

The University of Pennsylvania, Kent State University and the University of Michigan, among many others, also are reviewing and attempting to toughen their student conduct codes in meetings this month.

The University of Notre Dame, Southern Methodist University, the University of Idaho, Baylor University and the University of Washington are among campuses which have banned or plan to ban all drinking as a way to help control student behavior.

During the last year, countless other schools have tightened rules on student drinking by requiring students to register and get approval before throwing parties.

This school year, many colleges have begun handing out stiffer penalties to fraternities for a range of misdeeds, some of which used to be routinely dismissed with a "boys will be boys" attitude.

Ohio State University has become so strict in enforcing its student conduct code that the student judicial review board now has cases backed up into this summer.

At Western Illinois University, administrators last month banned overnight guests of the opposite sex from campus dorms.

The crackdowns and rules, of course, are reminiscent of the days when colleges actively regulated all kinds of student behavior, from sex to how they dressed.

"There are still a lot of administrators who'd like to return to the days when they ruled campuses with an iron hand, and you didn't breathe without them knowing it," said Bob Bingaman, field director of the United States Student Association.

Administrators themselves say fear, not hunger for power, is what is driving them to rein their students.

With more judges holding schools themselves liable for student drinking accidents, rapes and other crimes, many colleges are just trying to make sure their students do not get them into legal trouble, said Tom Goodale, vice chancellor for student affairs at the University of Denver.

A former student currently is suing Denver over an injury he received in an accident at a campus fraternity house.

"Schools are very scared by the cost of liability, about pressure from the public," Goodale said.

"A lot of concern over student discipline is happening because of efforts by students themselves," Bingaman said.

"I think there is definitely a more conservative trend and more concern for students to be treated like adults and act like adults," said Mary Anne Bestebreurtje, who is overseeing Florida's conduct code review.

But regulating students' behavior in their rooms, recreations and even reading matter is not often confused with being treated like adults, and some administrators worry prospective students might be offended by it.

"There's real conflict in clamping down on discipline and making the campus as attractive as possible for students," Goodale said. "But the problem (of liability) is progressing, and schools can't ignore it."

Students should not ignore the impact the national crackdown could have on their constitutional rights, said Alan Levine, co-author of the American Civil Liberties Union's "Handbook on the Rights of Students."

"Often there is a tendency to put due process aside in order to get on with discipline," he said.

"Not just in college administrations, but in hospitals, prisons, anywhere someone is charged with discipline (violations), they always find it difficult to enforce (conduct codes) when you have due process," he said.

Levine, however, said he does not see all the efforts to control student behavior as a return to "in loco parentis," the legal doctrine that gave colleges the right to act "in the place of the parent" through the 1960s.

The doctrine, he said, has been discredited, and probably couldn't withstand a lawsuit today.

Student newspaper to sue college for right to cover judicial hearings

By The College Press Service

COLLEGE PARK, Md. — The University of Maryland's student newspaper plans to sue the university for the right to report about student disciplinary hearings.

Maryland's "judicial system provides the equivalent of a closed, secret trial" that conflicts with the First Amendment, said Gary Gately, editor of The Diamondback.

The secrecy "places a direct constraint on the press," he said.

In March, the state attorney general had recommended keeping Diamondback reporters out of judicial board hearings because it would violate the Buckley Amendment to the Family Education Rights and Privacy Act of 1974.

The law guarantees the confidentiality of student records.

"The student's right to privacy is greater than the Diamondback's right to know," Michael Bishop, assistant to Maryland's director of judicial programs, said.

"We see no evidence that the Buckley Amendment applies to (judicial board) hearings," said Lee Levine, lawyer for Maryland media, the independent organization that owns The Diamondback and four other student publications.

The case could influence how readily papers on other campuses get to report on student disciplinary cases. The issue has become more important over the last six months as colleges have intensified their efforts to control student misbehavior.

The paper argues the judicial board hears criminal cases that would ordinarily be open to the press if the crimes had occurred off campus.

"They try rape, and wouldn't report it to the authorities unless they think the defendant is in danger," Gately said.

Reporter Erik Nelson said last fall a star basketball player secretly was brought before the board. "At first, all the word we had was that there was a dorm rule violation. Then we found out that there was a question of sexual assault. This is something that should be known."

Nelson argues criminal charges are not part of a student's record, and therefore should not be covered by the Privacy Act.

College Park, he added, has 40,000 students and all the crimes that happen in a small city. "We have robberies and assaults. If it happened off campus, anybody could attend the trial."

"As far as I'm concerned," Bishop said, "if a student wanted something to be public, then we would grant it."

Missouri

and in a statement released by Mondale's St. Louis office, the former vice president said the results showed he had won by a sizable margin.

"From the results we have so far in Missouri it looks like we're heading toward a solid win," Mondale said.

Don Foley, a press spokesman for Mondale, said checks of caucus locations by their organization showed Mondale had won 532 local delegates, Hart had won 202, Jackson had 52 and 30 local delegates were uncommitted.

Mondale's chief supporters in the state, U.S. Sen. Thomas Eagleton said "the size and scope of Walter Mondale's victory was beyond my broadest expectations."

The 955 local delegates to be chosen at the meetings Wednesday night later will determine the makeup of most of Missouri's 86-member delegation to the Democratic National Convention.

The results from the caucuses will determine the breakdown for 75 national convention delegates. The rest will be chosen later among top party and elected officials.

CBS News also predicted Mondale would emerge the victor in the Missouri caucuses, based on surveys of selected caucus locations. A spokesman for CBS in New York said the network projected Mondale would emerge with 67 percent of the local delegates, Hart would get 20 percent and Jackson would get 10 percent, with 3 percent uncommitted.

Just hours before the meetings began, Mondale made a campaign appearance in Kansas City and said the nation's economic recovery was being hurt by the Reagan administration's big budget deficits.

Senate ends funding for children's lab

By LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

Student Senate on Thursday voted to allocate no money to the Early Childhood Laboratory although the facility has received student funding for 11 years.

Senate met Thursday to continue consideration of a Finance Committee bill recommending tentative funding for campus groups for the 1984-1985 school year. Early Childhood Laboratory received $1,727.35 this year and was requesting $2,470 for next year to pay a graduate assistant. The committee recommended the lab receive no funding.

Early Childhood Laboratory is a preschool program with 18 children. It receives funding from student fees through senate allocations, the Department of Family and Childhood Development and user fees. The program will continue even if senate support is ended, Marjorie Stith, professor of family and child development, said.

"If we don't get the money from senate, we will have to increase fees," she said. "It will become a more expensive program, especially for the student."

There is currently a $2.75 a day charge per student for the preschool, which meets for three hours. Stith estimated the charge would have to be increased to $3.50.

The Early Childhood Laboratory has given children of K-State students top priority for entrance to the program. Several senators expressed concern at the possible loss of this priority. Kelli Anderson, agriculture senator, said K-State could lose prospective students if senate discontinued funding.

"If they (Early Childhood Laboratory) don't get any support from the students, that student priority is going to go down. Older students will look at our campus and see we have no day care system. Then they won't come to this campus," she said.

Student priority is not a decision made by the senate, said Kirk Porteous, Finance Committee chairman.

"Priority in the program is a decision made by Early Childhood Laboratory," he said. "That is not the decision we are here to make."

Brian O'Neill, graduate senator, disagreed with this reasoning.

"If you were in their (Early Childhood Laboratory) position, what would you do? Without student funding, why should students have priority?"

Kay Deever, education senator and Finance Committee member, said the lab's funding was large in proportion to the number of students served.

"This is the kind of service from which only participants benefit," she said. "Only a small number of students are involved with it, and I don't think the total student body should be responsible for its support."

Anderson proposed an amendment to allocate $1,701 to the lab. This amendment, and another which would have allocated $864.50, were defeated.

The Finance Committee also recommended the Women's Resource Center receive no funding. The group was allocated $475.20 last year. An amendment was introduced and passed giving the group $471.90 for advertising and to pay a work-study employee.

The Women's Resource Center also receives state funding through the Center for Student Development, said Earl Nolting, director of student development.

"The Center for Student Development provides funding for WRC from state money, but state money can't be used for advertising," he said. Work-study decisions are made too late for (receiving) state funding, he said.

Finance Committee members said their decision was based on possible duplication of WRC programs and recommended the group consider consolidation with another group such as U-Learn. Several senators objected to cutting funds for the group without further study of the issue. Tracy Turner, senate chairman, said he would organize a taskforce to study consolidation possibilities.

After brief debate, Black Student Union received a tentative allocation of $1,139. Students for Handicapped Concerns $2,134.80 and Consumer Relations Board received $3,549.20.

British ignore call of Libyan leader to free embassy

By The Associated Press

LONDON — With Britain and Libya in a diplomatic standoff, Libyan leader Col. Moammar Khadafy said Thursday he'd settle for "nothing else" but a lifting of the siege of his nation's London embassy.

Britain stuck to its demand to question the trapped Libyans and search the building for arms. And it brushed aside Khadafy's claims that British police were to blame for Tuesday's fatal shooting of a policewoman during an anti-Khadafy demonstration outside the embassy.

"His allegations are totally false," a Foreign Office spokesman said after Khadafy charged in a U.S. television interview from his capital, Tripoli, that British police and helicopters had attacked the embassy Tuesday.

The crisis began when a gunman from the embassy fired on 70 demonstrators, killing the policewoman and injuring 11 protesters.

"We have no gunmen here in this building and we have no guns or ammunition," insisted a man answering the phone at the embassy Thursday night. He refused to identify himself.

"We are innocent. We have not harmed anyone nor broken any laws in this country," he said.

In Tripoli, Libyan Foreign Minister Ali Abdussalam Treiki met with British Ambassador Oliver Miles, the Libyan news agency JANA reported. Tripoli radio, monitored in London, quoted Treiki as saying Britain's demand to search the London embassy is "unacceptable."

Assad, Gemayel meet to urge Lebanon unity

By The Associated Press

DAMASCUS, Syria — Presidents Hafez Assad of Syria and Amin Gemayel of Lebanon met Thursday to reform Lebanon's political system and weld warring factions into a national unity government after nine years of civil war.

Across the border in Lebanon, a truce took faltering hold as 200 unarmed observers — some dodging sniper fire — took up positions in the first phase of a disengagement agreed to 10 days ago.

Police said one person was killed and 37 were wounded in truce violations after the cease-fire was declared Wednesday night.

Gemayel, with an entourage that included Foreign Minister Elie Salem and top aides, arrived at Damascus airport Thursday morning for his second meeting with Assad in as many months.

There was no official comment on the ensuing talks at the presidential palace, but sources said the two leaders met for seven hours, in private and with aides, before taking a three-hour break and beginning an evening meeting.

The Syrian and Lebanese leaders were to discuss a blueprint for reforms laid out by the Christian Gemayel to give Lebanon's Moslems a greater share of power in the country, sources said. Lebanon has been dominated by Christians for more than 40 years.

A national unity government representing all factions would then be formed to implement the arrangements, the officials said, asking not to be identified.

Syria backs Lebanon's Druse and Shiite Moslem opposition groups, but Assad took a mediator's stance last month after Gemayel abandoned a U.S.-sponsored Lebanon-Israeli withdrawal agreement, which Syria had denounced.

In Beirut, the sporadic violence continued as 200 white-helmeted truce observers, all Lebanese, were deployed along the "green line" between the city's Christian and Moslem sectors and in the Shiite Moslem southern suburbs. Mine fields in the mountaintop town of Souk el-Gharb, east of Beirut, held up the deployment there until Friday, police said.

A four-party security committee overseeing the disengagement process said 1,800 policemen and army conscripts were moving into buffer zones at 7 a.m. Friday for the last stage of the disengagement operation.

Second engineering council elections favor president-elect

By ANGIE SCHARNHORST
Arts and Entertainment Editor and KECIA STOLFUS

In a second election, Dave Utech, junior in engineering technology, was elected Thursday as president of Engineering Student Council.

The results of an earlier election held Feb. 28-29, in which Utech also was elected president, were declared invalid after the current council suspected electioneering and unfair voting practices.

Dave Raetzl, senior in engineering technology, was elected secretary in this week's voting. He won more votes than Becky Bromich, sophomore in architectural engineering, who was elected to the position in the earlier election.

Jim Zinn, junior in engineering technology, and Jeff Schneider, senior in engineering technology, were elected vice-president and treasurer in the first election. Because they won by more than 50 votes, their positions were not questioned.

The second election decided four positions. In addition to Utech and Raetzl, write-in candidates Raphael Yunk, freshman in engineering, and Frank Vovk, freshman in engineering technology, were elected sophomore representatives.

The controversy about the legitimacy of the first election is "probably pretty well settled down now," said John Dollar, assistant dean of engineering.

"I feel like the right thing happened because we felt the first elections were fair," Utech said. "I had enough faith in the first election that we (his supporters) could win the second. We weren't certain for a while, but it looks like it came out for the best."

Approximately 250 engineering students voted in the second election, compared with 320 in the earlier race.

"The turnout was kind of low," said Diane Johnson, senior in electrical engineering and current council president. Johnson said holding the elections in the Union contributed to the low voter turnout. The first election was held in Durland and Seaton halls.

By moving the elections to the Union, the current council hoped to answer some of the questions raised by the first election, Johnson said.

"I really feel the (second) election was run fairly," she said. "The guidelines were followed to the letter."

The council-elect proposed a compromise after the election was declared invalid and allowed a new election for president and secretary. The council determined electioneering did not significantly influence the election of vice-president and treasurer because Zinn and Schneider both won by substantial margins.

"With the compromise, Becky Bromich and I were the only ones that had anything to lose," Utech said.

Utech said he owed his victory to his supporters, who "felt strongly enough about the council's action" to make the effort to vote in the second election.

"Apparently (our opponents) didn't feel as strongly as we did," about the council's action, Utech said. "I think almost everybody who voted (for us initially) stayed with it," he said.

A second vote was necessary for sophomore representatives after a ballot error invalidated the results.

"I was very happy with the election. All the rules were obeyed," Johnson said.

The council-elect will be instated at the next council meeting April 24.

Administration, academic experts argue reasons for crime decrease

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration took partial credit Thursday for the largest drop in reported crime in a generation, but academic observers attributed most of the decline to the aging of the post-World War II baby boom generation.

Releasing preliminary figures for 1983, the FBI said the number of serious crimes reported to police in the United States dropped 7 percent, the second significant decline in two years and the largest drop since 1960.

"This marvelous news proves we are beginning to win the battle against crime with some of the most significant initiatives and results in years," Attorney General William French Smith said. "The public is getting tougher about crime. So are we."

Smith hailed the administration's campaign against drug traffickers and said, "It is no coincidence that the decreases" come when prison populations are at an all-time high.

But academic experts, some of whom predicted the decline eight years before it happened, said demographic changes explain far more of the drop than other contributing factors, like declining unemployment, career criminal programs or citizen crime watch programs. They said the other factors are not felt so uniformly across the nation.

Most largely discounted is a federal role, primarily because the vast majority of crimes are state and local, not federal offenses.

The 1983 preliminary figures showed declines in all seven major crimes on the FBI Crime Index, in every region and every size community.

The FBI report said violent crimes of murder, rape, robbery and aggravated assault declined 5 percent from 1982. The far more numerous property crimes of burglary, larceny-theft and motor vehicle theft dropped 7 percent.

Professor Alfred Blumstein of Carnegie-Mellon University in Pittsburgh predicted in the 1970s that baby boom aging would cut crime in the 1980s.

"The relatively fewer people born in the late 1960s are now occupying the high crime ages of the mid-to late teens," Blumstein said. "So there are fewer people in the ages that have the highest propensity to commit crimes."

Reagan pledges boost in exports

By The Associated Press

TACOMA, Wash. — President Reagan, setting out Thursday on his journey to China, pledged to do what he could to boost U.S. exports to the world's most populous nation and praised the Japanese for resolving trade problems with the United States.

"I go as something of a salesman, doing everything I can up to the limit of putting a 'Buy America' sticker on my bag," Reagan told a group of exporters and business leaders.

The stop in this center of the nation's timber trade was the first of four on the president's more-than 11,000-mile trip to Peking, his destination on Thursday. He was planning to spend the rest of this week relaxing and studying at his ranch northwest of Santa Barbara, Calif., and will follow a similar routine in Honolulu on Monday.

Reflecting on China's current trend toward a freer economy, Reagan said, "The change that has occurred there, their willingness to collaborate with private enterprise, is an amazing change."

He noted that the United States is China's third-largest trading partner. In 1982, the latest year for which statistics are available, the two countries completed $5.2 billion in two-way trade.

"We want to further improve the investment climate," he said, referring to talks he will hold in Peking on tax and financial investment agreements.

"There are other trade issues we're still resolving with China," he said. "The truth is, in any growing relationship there will be some growing pains."

In his discussion with the exporters, the president said he was aware of their problems, including the difficulty of competing with "state-subsidized goods from other nations — some of which are doing this in violation of international agreements."

"Then there is Japan," he said, raising a subject that has become particularly sensitive in the world of international trade as a result of Japan's successful efforts to sell its automobiles, electronic gear and other products far beyond its borders.

"Japan's been a fine friend to us in many respects," the president said. "We still have a lot of trade questions to work out with Tokyo, but we've made some major progress in the last two years."

Fulbright scholar awards available

Fulbright Scholar Awards competition is under way, with some 800 awards available this year.

The Council for International Exchange of Scholars (CIES), through the U.S. Information Agency (USIA), has received from agencies and embassies abroad the list of awards available to American scholars, and information and applications have been sent to college and university campuses.

Usually covering periods of two to 10 months, Fulbright Scholar Awards are available in all academic fields and in a wide range of professions. This year's offerings include approximately 275 awards for postdoctoral research, about a third of the total. The remainder are for college and university lecturing or for consultative or teaching positions with governmental bodies or other professional institutions, such as hospitals, orchestras and theatres, museums and cultural centers and the news media.

More than 100 countries in all areas of the world offer awards under the Fulbright program.

Application deadlines for the 1985-1986 competition are: June 15, 1984, for Australasia, India, Latin America and the Caribbean, and Sept. 15, 1984, for Africa, Asia (India), Europe and the Middle East.

Linot will intern in the WIBW Farm Department this summer.

The annual scholarship is given to an outstanding K-State junior enrolled in the College of Agriculture who has exhibited significant interest in a career in Farm Broadcast Journalism.

Sump pump failure in Justin causes partial power outage

A sump pump failure caused a power outage that affected a large portion of the eastern half of campus Wednesday.

The initial outage, which affected Justin Hall, K-State President Duane Acker's residence, the Art Building, part of Seaton Court, Anderson Hall and Holtz Hall was caused when a sump pump located in the basement of Justin failed, according to Fred Ferguson, director of building utilities for University Facilities.

"Three motors were damaged by water shorting them out when the sump pump failed. This caused water from an underground spring beneath Justin to rise to short out the big motor," Ferguson said. "Two pumps and one air handler motor, which is used for building ventilation, were damaged."

"The cause of the outage," Jack Watson, superintendent of University Facilities, said, "was not that the circuit was overloaded, but that one phase of a three-phase circuit was out, and that causes motors to get hot and catch fire. The motor caught fire, but was put out by the technician immediately," Watson said.

The sump pumps are used to keep the spring water out of a concreted area in Justin used for equipment storage.

"Power was shut off from 5 to 8 p.m. for repair purposes," Gene Cross, vice president for University Facilities, said.

This shutdown, which affected Kedzie Hall and McCain Auditorium, was to ensure that back-up power loops were shut off.

"It was necessary these (power loops) be shut down to protect the people who were working. We had to be sure the voltage was off for repairs to be made," Ferguson said.

Local police arrest youth for robbery

A 16-year-old youth was taken into custody by the Riley County Police Department about 1 a.m. Thursday and charged with aggravated robbery in an incident at a Manhattan laundromat late Wednesday.

The youth was released to his parents after questioning. He is accused of holding a knife to the throat of an employee at the Wildcat Coin-A-Matic, 205 S. Seth Childs Road, and taking $400 about 9:30 p.m. Wednesday.

Siege

and is contrary to international traditions."

But JANA said, "A common wish was confirmed at the meeting to deal with this matter and settle it amicably."

The British Foreign office said the meeting "was good, and both sides indicated that they were looking for a peaceful solution."

Miles said in a telephone interview with the British Broadcasting Corp., "I think that the problems here reflect what's happening in London. But the central negotiations are going on in London."

British officials were asked about a report on ABC television that U.S. intelligence had intercepted and passed on to London a radio message from Tripoli ordering the embassy to use force against Tuesday's demonstrators.

"We had no specific information to lead us to believe that an incident of this kind would occur," the Foreign Office said in a formal statement. A spokesman refused to elaborate.

However, Britain's Independent Television News, in a report from Washington, said an unidentified American intelligence source had confirmed that a call between Tripoli and the London embassy was monitored at the U.S. National Security Agency headquarters at Fort Meade, Va.

"The same source adds that information from that call concerning the possible use of force was passed on," ITN reporter John Snow said.

He said between 10 and 15 Britons work at the NSA, and "They would learn almost immediately of any development affecting Britain."

As darkness fell, a police spokesman near the embassy said the condition was "stable" but did not elaborate.

Home Secretary Leon Brittan, after heading two meetings of the Cabinet's crisis committee, visited police at London's hushed St. James' Square, where sharpshooters' rifles are trained on the five-story embassy and its estimated 20-30 occupants.

"It's a very impressive scene of steadiness, patience and resolve," said Brittan.

In Tripoli, where Khadafy's revolutionary guards on Wednesday lifted a two-day retaliatory siege of the British Embassy, placard-waving protesters staged a demonstration for two hours. One sign bore the message: "Jamahiriya (Libya) Love It or Leave It."

In major cities around the world, Libyan envoys called news conferences to reiterate charges of British "criminality," underlining Khadafy's claims that British police started the crisis by assaulting the embassy. The building is known officially as the Libyan People's Bureau.

The Foreign Office, in contact with British Ambassador Oliver Miles heading negotiations in Tripoli, said only that it was awaiting an "early reply" to its terms for lifting the siege.

Britain wants to question the people in the embassy and search it for weapons.

The demands were put Wednesday by Richard Luce, the Foreign Office minister of state, to Libya's senior envoy here, Muftah Fitouri. Fitouri was not in the embassy at the time of the shooting.

British government sources said privately that Libya showed little sign of yielding and they expected a "long haul."

Fiesta shows, honors Mexican heritage

(Editor's note: This is the fifth of eight articles about little-known historical sites in Kansas. "Hidden Places" is a program of University for Man and K-State's Division of Continuing Education.)

By ADAM ROME
Contributing Writer

It is dusk on a September Friday. Santa Fe Park is filled with people drinking beer and margaritas, eating enchiladas and cotton candy. A few proud parents are taking photographs of daughters in queenly gowns. The band is practicing, mariachi and Michael Jackson.

"Welcome," the master of ceremonies begins, "welcome to the 66th annual Chanute Mexican Fiesta!"

The fiesta is the oldest in Kansas, a time to reflect as well as revel.

Emigrants from Mexico have lived here since 1908, first in box cars along the railroad tracks, then in the brick row houses of "Little Mexico," now in houses scattered throughout the city.

But the box cars were abandoned long ago and the brick row houses were razed in the 1960s to make possible a Wal-Mart shopping center, so the Fiesta is all that remains now as a monument to the old life in the "barrio."

"It's a big memory time," Antonia Alonzo said, and the memories are first of sensuous things, of sights and sounds — the willows cut by the river for use as decorations; the flickerings of kerosene lamps; the old platforms, built from railroad ties and grain doors; the girls selling food from the porches, and then dancing in aprons; the boys rushing madly across the yard in hope of partners.

"It was fun," Cruz Jimenez said with a smile. "They had a custom, about midnight of the second day, the regular days are the 15th and 16th of September, the 16th was when independence was signed, and I remember that when the time came, the president (of the Fiesta Committee) would recite a speech about independence."

"And right about midnight, ole Juan Tachito'd get some of those torpedoes from the railroad, you know, and lay them on a concrete slab that was there all the time, and about the time that they hollered 'Viva Mexico!' and all that, he would — Psow! — bomb one up, it sounded like a bomb."

"And we kids...we'd go down there and we'd say, 'Come on, Mr. Tachito, do another one, do another one,' and he'd listen over there for another 'Viva Mexico!' and, bomb, another one! He was the master of that, the master of explosions," Jimenez said.

Other memories are more serious, of moments of responsibility.

The men gave speeches that retold the story of the revolution, Hacinto Verdin recalled, "and they didn't just come out here (and) say a speech. They come out and do their part just like they were acting, acting the part of these heroes of Mexico."

The two queens would do a skit, in which one girl spoke for Spain, and one for Mexico.

"Spain would tell what all she had done for Mexico," Trine Ysusi explained, "and Mexico would contradict her. You know, Spain would say that 'we brought you the alphabet, and we brought you history and civilization,' and Mexico would reply, 'yes, but you also brought us diseases and other bad things...'"

"I think everyone was honored to do the little skit," Antonia Alonzo adds, "and I don't think there was ever a girl that turned it down."

There are memories lastly of events, of years of change — the first years of the depression, when more than half of the Mexicans left Chanute and when the fiesta almost died; the year when the Chamber of Commerce first gave money in support of the fiesta; the years after the war, when whites first began to attend the fiesta in large numbers; the year when the governor first crowned the queen; the year when the Fiesta Committee was first able to afford a band from Mexico.

The fiesta in Chanute is thus a shorthand chronicle of a community, and a reminder of the importance of roots — a reminder of the very meaning of history.

In the days when everyone worked for the railroad, the 15th and 16th of September were undeclared holidays, when nobody worked and nobody cared about the consequences. It is still an important as well as an exciting time, a time when people of all ages return together.

As Mike De la Torre explained, "I've only missed two fiestas in my whole life — when I was in the service in Idaho and couldn't afford to come home — and it tore me up."

Judge dismisses defendant in desegregation lawsuit

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The U.S. Department of Education was eliminated as a defendant Wednesday from the metropolitan school desegregation case by U.S. District Court Judge Russell Clark.

The ruling leaves three defendants in the case. They are the Kansas City School District, the state of Missouri and the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.

The non-jury trial began Oct. 31 with 15 defendants. On April 2, Clark dropped 11 suburban school districts from the case.

Wednesday's ruling was made at the request of federal lawyers who claimed that evidence did not prove that the department shared the blame for the existence of a segregated school system.

The plaintiffs are attempting to show that the Education Department failed to enforce desegregation and discrimination policies in the Kansas City area.

That resulted, the plaintiffs said, in the Kansas City School District becoming mostly black and the surrounding districts mostly white.

Gun-toting man poses no threat to Mondale

By The Associated Press

DEARBORN, Mich. — Secret Service agents, in the second such incident in recent weeks, hustled an armed union official away from Democratic presidential contender Walter F. Mondale during a campaign appearance Thursday.

The man offered no resistance and was released a short time later.

He was identified by the Secret Service as William Polakowski. In Washington, Secret Service spokesman Jack Smith said agents released Polakowski after questioning and deciding there had been no threat.

Smith said Polakowski had a permit for the gun he was carrying in his back pocket.

In Detroit, a United Auto Workers spokeswoman identified Polakowski as an international representative working out of Detroit.

He was reaching over some people between himself and Mondale, apparently to shake hands, when agents noticed a gun in his rear pocket. Mondale was talking to Polakowski at the time.

One agent locked the man's arm behind his back and rushed him into a men's room at the rear of a banquet hall where Mondale had been speaking to a 500-a-person reception.

Ray Majerus, UAW secretary-treasurer, said Polakowski had a permit for the pistol and had forgotten that he had the gun with him.

Majerus described Polakowski as "a very harmless man with a gun."

The incident occurred as Mondale had finished brief remarks and was working his way toward an exit, shaking hands as he went.

Polakowski's father, Bill Sr., appeared in the hallway outside where his son was being held.

"My son carries a gun and so do I. He has a permit," the father said.

Agents questioned the man in the men's room for about 15 minutes.

Polakowski then was released and drove away in a car with his father.

In Mobile, Ala., on March 9, agents took into custody a 77-year-old court bailiff who was wearing a holstered gun when he approached Mondale. The man, Clarence Montgomery, was released several hours later after questioning.

"Both cases, they had a permit and it was legal," said Smith.

Protest of allocations past due

What would it take to make K-State students protest?

At the University of Notre Dame in South Bend, Ind., about 2,000 students marched on the administration building this week, dumping confetti and shredded newspapers in the hall. The students actions were in retaliation of a new policy that would punish drunkenness on campus and limit the number of people permissible at a dormitory room party to twice the number who live there.

Perhaps drinking infringements would also prompt protests on this campus. Considering the amount of money the Associated Students of Kansas spends to waylay legislation to raise the drinking age, consumption of alcohol is supposedly the top priority of all K-State students.

But recent campus political maneuvering — Student Senate's unfair allocations — is worthy of some uproar also.

Students should definitely be concerned about how senate is spending more than $700,000 in activity fees. After the disastrous cuts many campus groups have suffered under senate's knife, any protest, peaceful or demonstrative, is past due.

Let's hope next year's senate will consist of students who care enough to protest this senate's perception of the student status quo — evident in the allocation of major funds to ASK and the Student Governing Association while slighting such organizations as the Early Childhood Development Laboratory and the International Coordinating Council. They should consider instead the diversified needs of the K-State student body in allocating funds.

CIA credibility suffers again

The Central Intelligence Agency is apparently under public scrutiny for shady tactics once again.

The controversy involves an apparent agent with poor money management skills and private investors expecting a 27 to 100 percent return on their investment. The money was used in financing an extravagant lifestyle for the agent in Hawaii and CIA spy trips to China and other foreign countries.

The investment facade ended in bankruptcy. Investors, many of whom wagered their retirement money on the scheme, lost. One burning question remains: Did the CIA run the investment company as a facade or was it agent Ronald R. Rewald's private concern?

The CIA concedes it didn't control Rewald's investment company. It denied being a part of the company. Rewald, however, claims the CIA was in full control of the company.

Several investors have sued the CIA to recover losses from the bankrupt business. Rewald also has sued the CIA for abandoning him and ruining his business career when investors came to collect.

No one knows yet whether or not the business was controlled by the CIA or Rewald. The CIA persuaded the U.S. District Court in Honolulu to seal evidence on grounds that it might endanger national security.

It is almost inconceivable to believe the CIA wouldn't have known of Rewald's investment company. The CIA claims to know the secrets of foreign countries, but is clueless about what one of its own agents is doing. The courts will have to decide what the relationship was between the CIA and the investment company.

A more important question concerning everyone is, as the Wall Street Journal eloquently put it: Is the "CIA, in fulfilling its foreign-policy mission...abetting crimes against U.S. citizens, either intentionally or through negligence?"

In this particular case, the answer is obviously yes. Whether Rewald was acting in a private manner or whether it was a CIA facade, the CIA is responsible regardless for the actions of its agents.

The investors were used as pawns in the CIA's game. They are entitled to be reimbursed. This fiasco only adds to the poor publicity the CIA has generated since the mid-1960s.

In love with Washington

WASHINGTON — It's finally happened. My girlfriends will be so impressed. Mom and Dad will be encouraged. Grandma will be absolutely relieved.

I've fallen in love.

I'm in love with the scent of cherry blossoms and the view of the mall from the west side of the Capitol; with Haagen-Dasz ice cream, cinnamon and raisin bagels and carry-out delis; with Georgetown boutiques and Georgetown clothes and Georgetown town houses; with the view of the Potomac from the Chesapeake and Ohio canals, subway trains and newsstands, yellow daffodil clusters and outdoor cafes, reflecting pools and crowds on the sidewalk, men in three-piece suits and intellectual flamboyancy; with break dancing in the streets, hot dog vendors on the corners and Congressmen in the halls.

It's Washington in the spring. A beautiful city even by highbrow European standards, Washington is a gorgeous, blushing debutante in April.

To add to the joviality of the season is the lack of work to be done here this week.

It's Easter recess and relatively little needs to be accomplished. Most Congressmen are back in their home districts and we hill people amuse ourselves by making ice cream runs and bank deposits, getting haircuts and manicures, taking two-hour outdoor lunch breaks and strolling down the mall.

The only care I have in the world is the nagging realization that I'll have to leave all this — so much, too soon.

But I have a vicious outlet for the political withdrawal I will suffer upon my return to Kansas; my T-shirt. I found it in Georgetown. I will wear it often — with relish.

Re: "Conflicts arise with new policy for auto towing," in the April 17 Collegian, and "Wheel clamps combat illegal parking problem," in the Jan. 22, 1982, Collegian:

I'd like to comment on what I feel is a better approach to towing, which supposedly was settled in the spring of 1982. This all stems from personal experience gained at the time.

I was late for a parachute class at 7:30 p.m. and pulled into a two-thirds empty parking lot. When my lights hit the handicapped sign, I didn't give it much thought since it was late evening, and again, the lot was mostly empty. (My first mistake.) I ran to class, paid $75 to join and returned an hour later.

I found the stall empty, and figured the campus police had been a bit overzealous that evening. I walked to Traffic and Security and asked why they had my truck towed.

I learned that two different patrol cars had been involved. The first officer simply put a $30 ticket on my truck. Some 15 minutes later, a second officer drove by and elected to have it towed. I couldn't believe all the attention one lone truck had received, considering all the outcries we hear regarding campus security. I bitterly asked the second officer why he didn't put on a wheel lock.

This was outlined in the Collegian, Jan. 22, 1982, page 7. "Areas on campus where wheel clamps are applied include handicapped zones and service areas...The owner must pay a $20 fine to have the device removed...Stone said."

The second officer said it didn't fit. This was a gross lie. Quote from Patrolman Richard Herrman in the Collegian, "The device can be applied to any wheel...it takes only three to five minutes..."

I was sent to a tow yard out by Fort Riley Boulevard and greeted by the guard dog. An attendant came out and asked for a $30 tow charge before I could take my truck. I'm now down $60.

I paid, and immediately returned to Traffic and Security. I asked the second officer to show me how the wheel lock didn't fit. He became irate, but I wouldn't leave until he showed me. Pulling it out of his trunk, he bent over by the front left tire and said, "See, it doesn't fit."

I took it from him, opened it and placed it on the tire. With his finger now in my face, he informed me that it was up to him whether to tow or lock. I have three on-campus witnesses to this.

Now, two years later, it seems this policy is still questionable, and all you're concerned with is "high donors" being towed. They can better afford towing charges than budget-cut students.

I was definitely wrong for parking there, but $60 worth? And half of that went to a service that didn't even benefit the K-State campus. I'd have felt a little bit better had all $60 gone toward some student service.

All the act of towing does is remove potential fine income from our campus.

Solution:

— In addition to a $30 ticket, infraction offenders must pay an additional $30 for wheel lock removal instead of an off-campus tow charge.

— Make sure the campus police know how to install wheel locks.

— Determine how many vehicles have been towed and what that represents in dollars lost to K-State (potential fine revenue).

— Investigate whether there are any questionable patterns between officers who tow vs. those who use wheel locks, in addition to which tow services have been used. What's wrong with the Standard Station right across the street?

By the way, I dropped the parachute class to recoup my $75 to offset the $60. I have not parked illegally since. Keep that money on campus.

Letters

Coverage of Sig Eps was timely, important

Editor,

Re: Kathy Mueller's letter, "Student says hazing story unprofessional," in the April 19 Collegian:

Mueller makes the statement that the Collegian is "a training ground for journalism hopefuls." Astute observation. That's exactly what it is. She says the article was "littered with biases and half-truths," yet she fails to cite any examples.

Next, she said the story wasn't timely and was sensationalized by its placement on the front page. Since the Interfraternity Council meeting was April 16, and the story was printed April 18, it looks pretty timely to me. And I don't think accusations come up every day on the average college campus that have this kind of significance. Usually, the stories with importance go on the front page.

"It was obvious to this reader that the staff reporters were singling out this particular fraternity." Only fitting, since they are the ones who allegedly did the hazing. Then, she calls the story muckraking, "which supposedly went out in the 19th century." As we see almost every day, muckraking is certainly alive and well in the United States, although this reader didn't see any of it in this story.

The topper, in my estimation, was the comment that the three women "made a federal case out of a few isolated incidents." Would you rather the women kept quiet about possible injustice done to them? I would hope not. I congratulate these women, if their allegations are true, for speaking out.

I believe, and I hope, this is an isolated incident. If that is not the case, I look forward to more campus media coverage of greek life.

Reporters unobjective with greek stories

Editor,

Re: Lee White's editorial, "Universities must quiet greeks," in the April 19 Collegian:

Alas, here we are again with another exciting episode in the "Let's Grill the Greeks" series featured in the Collegian. Kathy Mueller was kind to call some of the reporting "unprofessional." However, the latest outburst from the pen of White seems to exemplify the Collegian's position that when it comes to the greek system, anything that is discrediting is going to get big coverage; a fine example of objective reporting.

For example, the Sig Ep story was defamatory in nature and thus received front page exposure. However, our fraternity had a social service project to raise money for the American Heart Association last week in Aggieville, which included guests like Gov. John Carlin and Art Stone, director of the K-State Police Department. What happened to the story? Place your bets. One can assume that since it didn't have great sensational appeal, it got lost in the shuffle with any of a host of other "Greeks Ain't So Bad" articles.

It used to infuriate me to read such interesting editorials like "Universities must quiet greeks" which are serving K-State students by exposing the "dirty laundry" of the greek system, until it finally occurred to

Robel protects noisy greeks

Editor,

Re: "Officials cite greek parties for loudness," in the April 18 Collegian:

Barb Robel's refusal to inform the press about future nuisance complaints filed against greek houses is typical of the cover-your-ass attitude that makes greeks the focus of suspicion and derision.

Robel is quoted calling press coverage "a very negative type of reinforcement" for greeks who disturb the peace. I call it the only protection the public has against obnoxious behavior.

If a sorority or fraternity reacts to such publicity by being even noisier and rowdier (presumably this is what Robel meant), perhaps that house's charter should be killed. The greek living system is supposed to provide leadership and support that helps its members grow into better adults. If publicizing antisocial behavior causes even worse deportment, the greek system has broken down and is no longer fulfilling its promises.

University proves to be exceptional host

Editor,

I am writing this letter to remind the K-State community how proud they should be of our University.

Last week during the National Speech Tournament, approximately 550 students visited K-State from more than 100 college campuses across the nation.

As the host for our campus, I received so many compliments about our facilities that I began to see our campus in a new light. I walk our sidewalks so often and am so familiar with the buildings, especially the Union, that I forget to appreciate what we have.

I especially want to remind you to look around our Union and see it from the perspective of a visitor. It is a lovely facility and the people who manage it and administer our food service are doing our campus a great service. I want them to know that we appreciate the professional job they perform for us and the prestigious image they create for K-State.

Future unknown for centenarian

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A 109-year-old Kansas City, Kan., man held in the fatal shooting of his 91-year-old invalid wife last month will not be charged with a crime, officials said.

Wyandotte County District Attorney Nick A. Tomasic ruled Wednesday that there is no evidence proving that Edward Franks intentionally killed his wife Zepora.

However, Associate District Court Judge Philip L. Sieve said Thursday that Franks' future is uncertain. He said a hearing Wednesday was continued until next week to determine who will care for Franks.

Lewis wants death to be 'paydirt'

NEW YORK — Comedian Jerry Lewis, host of the annual Labor Day Muscular Dystrophy Association telethon, says he has written a letter to the association to be opened after his death.

"I wrote, 'Turn my death into paydirt,'" Lewis said in an interview with Parade magazine. "Anybody who's honest and cares can replace Jerry Lewis, but beg the people to give in his memory. Look at how much he gave; it probably killed him."

"Turn me into a theatrical martyr, use my death positively," Lewis said he advised the association. "Don't waste it. Use it."

Is there life after campaigning?

LOS ANGELES — U.S. Sen. Alan Cranston says he went through a bit of a post-campaign letdown after quitting the Democratic presidential race Feb. 29. But he said he feels more sorry for another ex-contender than for himself.

At least, said Cranston, he has a seat in the Senate, which he calls "The Club."

"Poor George McGovern didn't even have a house to go back to; it burned down."

Cranston was referring to a fire that charred McGovern's apartment last May 16 while the former senator was away.

His few strands of hair are gray again, not the darker color they were dyed during the campaign to make him look youthful. At 69 he is practically bald, lean and wiry, although campaign aides had tried to fatten him up.

Carter's actions worries newsmen

NEW YORK — PBS media watchdog Hodding Carter III sees no conflict of interest in substituting for Ted Koppel on ABC's "Nightline," as he did one night this week.

Some staffers at NBC and CBS news headquarters in New York have griped that Carter, host of the PBS series "Inside Story," may be compromising his objectivity. They point to a highly complimentary portrait of ABC anchor Peter Jennings on "Inside Story," which is often critical of the media.

"I'm not even concerned about my fairness," said Carter, who also writes a column for the Wall Street Journal, "and I'm never sure about my objectivity. I've always worn a dozen hats."

Weather

Mostly cloudy and windy today with a 40 percent chance of rain and possibly thundershowers. High low- to mid-60s. East to southeast winds 15 to 30 mph and gusty. Cloudy tonight with a 60 percent chance of rain and possibly thundershowers, low near 50. Cloudy and cool Saturday with rain likely, high low- to mid-50s.

Kansas candidates raise election funds

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sen. Nancy Kassebaum has met more than half her total election fund-raising goal with seven months to go before November's voting, while Democratic challenger Jim Maher has failed to get off the ground in raising campaign money.

Kassebaum raised $92,000 in the first three months of this year, slightly more than half of it from special-interest groups, according to reports filed this week with the Federal Election Commission. She had $207,000 on hand by the end of March, and combined with money raised in 1983, has collected roughly $300,000 toward her re-election effort, which is expected to cost a total of about $500,000.

Her opponent, Overland Park businessman Maher, showed he had $21,000 in cash by March 31, and all but $100 of his income came from a personal loan he made to his own campaign. Maher's report showed he had spent $1,600 so far on his long-shot candidacy.

Kassebaum's report showed she got $2,000 from Republican Party-connected groups and $43,000 from individuals. Major individual givers included top officials of Hallmark Cards, based in Kansas City, Mo., who contributed $2,250.

The largest part of her first-quarter money — $47,000 — came from political action committees, groups formed specifically to funnel campaign money to candidates in hopes of protecting their political interests in Washington.

They included, as would be expected, heavy giving from groups most directly affected by Kassebaum's position on the Senate Commerce Committee and her chairmanship of its aviation subcommittee.

Gifts from airlines like United, Eastern and American, and aircraft makers like Lockheed, Boeing, Beech and the General Aviation Manufacturers totaled $6,500. The Air Line Pilots Association chipped in another $1,000.

Kassebaum has been a primary sponsor of major changes in natural gas regulation, reflected in giving from groups like the American Gas Association, Columbia Gas, Interstate Natural Gas Association and Panhandle Eastern pipeline, which gave a total of $3,250.

And insurance interests were heavy givers, putting up at least $4,150. Kassebaum supported a delay last year in committee action on a bill opposed by insurance companies that would have barred them from using sex as a factor in setting rates.

"She hasn't broken her back to raise money," said top aide David Bartel, who added all the income had resulted from fund-raising letters or unsolicited contributions. Kassebaum has participated in only one money-raising reception, held in connection with Sen. Robert Dole's Campaign America last month in New York.

The next largest fund-raiser among Kansas candidates was Second District Rep. Jim Slattery, a Democrat from Topeka. Slattery pulled in nearly $40,000 during the first three months of the year, using about $15,000 to pay off debts, including a $10,000 loan from the candidate left over from the 1982 race. He finished the period with about $29,000 on hand.

Slattery's largest donation was a $4,000 gift from the rubber workers union, which has members at the large Goodyear plant in Topeka. He also received $1,000 from gas and oil interests, which have been watching closely as the House Energy and Commerce Committee, of which Slattery is a member, has dealt with natural gas pricing legislation.

Jim Van Slyke, a conservative Republican who is opposing Slattery, reported raising $3,210, including a $250 gift of "campaign school expenses" from the National Conservative Political Action Committee, usually known by its acronym NCPAC. He reported $14,000 in debts, most of it for polling and political consulting services.

Fourth District Congressman Dan Glickman, a Wichita Democrat, raised $35,000 during the first quarter. Nearly two-thirds of it came from PACs, which have been the target of efforts by Glickman and others to limit spending and influence. Many of the PAC givers were agriculture oriented, in keeping with Glickman's position on the House Agriculture Committee.

Among 33 individual contributions to Glickman listed in his report, four were from Wichita and the rest from outside the state. Many were from Washington, D.C., including checks from lobbyists like Jack Valenti, president of the Motion Picture Association of America. Glickman had $75,000 as of March 31.

First District Congressman Pat Roberts, Dodge City Republican, raised $13,000 during the period, most of it in small individual gifts, and finished the quarter with the second-highest fund among House members: $104,000.

The wealthiest Kansas House member in terms of political funds, as usual, was Fifth District Congressman Bob Whittaker, an Augusta Republican. He raised just $6,000 during the first three months of the year, but carried over a large balance from earlier fund-raising efforts and finished the quarter with $144,000 on hand.

No report was available for Third District Rep. Larry Winn, the Overland Park Republican who is retiring after his current term. No report need be filed until candidates have spent or raised at least $5,000. Jan Meyers, a candidate to succeed Winn, reported she had raised $8,000, nearly all of it in small individual gifts.

Student nets awards in theatrical weekend

By GREG PROSKE
Collegian Reporter

Vincent Cortez Bly, senior in theater, is a born performer — and a busy one.

Last weekend, he rehearsed for a Lunchbag Theater performance, competed in the National Individual Events Speech Tournament held at K-State and performed in "The Good Woman of Setzuan," which was staged Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights.

Not only did Bly perform, he performed well enough to earn second place in the poetry interpretation competition in the speech tournament. He also won a spot among the top 12 in the nation in the dramatic interpretation competition.

"I'm just relieved that it's all over with," he said.

To compete on the national level in forensics, it is necessary to have first won many contests throughout the United States, Bly said.

"My selections have been winning all over the country," he said. "The tournaments are held on weekends. Our team usually leaves on Thursday and comes back on Sunday."

"Since I've been up here (at K-State), I've never had a weekend where I can just sit around and say 'What am I going to do this weekend?'" he said.

The poetry selections he performed at the tournament were "About Atlanta" and "Spell Number Seven," by Ntozake Shange. The dramatic interpretation selection was "The Little Shop Horror," by Howard Ashman.

"I feel like I've been put through a meat grinder, but I love it," he said about last weekend. "I'm starting to think about selections for next year."

Bly is the president of K-State's Ebony Theater and used to be chairman of the Fine Arts Council. Many of his other activities are influenced by fine arts.

"I love to write poetry from time to time. When I'm not acting I love to read, especially autobiographies."

"I get paid $10 per story to tell stories in story telling classes, and I emcee things like the Greek Follies, University Sing and Homecoming. I enjoy doing that and don't usually accept payment," Bly said.

In addition to his other activities, Bly works four hours a week for the Center for Student Development, where he performs clerical duties. He also is a member of the Delta Upsilon fraternity.

"I'm around theater people all the time and I need the fraternity for my more socially normal brothers. The fraternity is just super supportive of what I do. The members of it bought up 80 seats for the play for themselves and their mothers," he said.

"I didn't like the play ('The Good Woman of Setzuan') and my character (Yang Sun) at first," Bly said.

He said he didn't think he could give anything to the character. His frustration with his role lasted seven weeks.

"Then, the opening night of the play it hit me as to who the character was and what he wanted. That's what always happens," he said.

Since Bly has been at K-State, he has performed often in theater productions, most recently "The Merry Death," produced by Lunchbag Theater, "The Good Woman of Setzuan," produced by the K-State Players and "Landscape," produced by Lunchbag Theater.

"I'm a miserable wreck when I'm not in a play. I can't handle the real world for too long. I need to be in theater," said Bly, who began acting in high school.

"In high school I had to stay after school one day, and auditions for a school play were being held and I tried out. I got the lead. They took a monologue from the play and had me perform it in a forensics tournament, and I won," Bly said.

This was a deciding factor in his pursuit of theater, he said.

Bly said that during his first three years at K-State he was afraid to get involved in forensics because he thought he would have to match what he did in high school — placing fifth in a national tournament in humorous interpretation — and he couldn't see how he could do that.

"That's why I was involved with so many plays; because I was just staying away from forensics. This is the first year that I've gotten back into it."

"I enjoy dissecting a character's personality and putting it on display," Bly said. "I love theater. When it comes to theater, I give it my all."

In preparation for a production, Bly said he doesn't practice his roles.

"I let it come naturally. I don't really practice. One performance is never the same," he said.

Bly can also sing — if it's a character's voice — and dance.

"Vincent, the person, cannot sing," he said. "I don't do very good with dancing, but I'm working on it."

Staff/Allen Eyestone

"When it comes to theater, I give it my all," Vincent Cortez Bly, senior in theater, said. Last weekend Bly played the part of Yang Sun in "The Good Woman of Setzuan," participated in a national speech tournament and rehearsed for a Lunchbag Theater production.

BFA exhibits include sculpture, jewelry

By DENISE WILLSON
Collegian Reporter

The fourth exhibit by seniors receiving bachelor of fine arts degrees is scheduled to be on display in five areas of campus beginning Monday.

The exhibit, the fourth out of five, is a requirement for students receiving such a degree.

Tod Machin, whose emphasis is drawing, will present his exhibit in Deibler Gallery located in the painting section of West Stadium.

He will present pieces made with such materials as graphite and turpentine, felt marker and Prisma colored pencil and acrylic on paper.

The graphite and turpentine medium is a process by which turpentine is used to dilute a graphite pencil to push the pencil around as a "wash," rather than a solid line, Machin said.

Machin has exhibited work previously at Farrell Library. None of the pieces in that show will be included in his BFA exhibition.

Most of Machin's works are portrait or figurative pieces influenced by two-dimensional media, he said.

Phil Green and Alicia Dayton, also emphasizing drawing in their curricula, will present their art works in Art Building Room 6.

In addition to drawing, Green has worked with sculpture and photography. Included in his show will be a wood carving and a soapstone sculpture. He will include pencil and charcoal drawings, as well as some photographs.

Green received honorable mention for three years for his work in the K-State Undergraduate Art Student Comprehensive show. He placed second in the "Amateur Places" category of the Union Program Council photography contest. He also had a one-man show in Junction City in 1982.

Dayton will present mostly figure drawings.

Dayton said figures are the hardest to draw and drawing them has helped her develop her perspective.

Dayton has exhibited her work once previously in an exhibit of college work which was taken to various high schools for display.

Ruthanne Robertson, whose emphasis is in metal smithing and jewelry, will present her work in the Farrell lobby.

The jewelry she will display will include mostly neck pieces done in brass and silver. She also uses seashells to create jewelry, she said.

Robertson said she will take one idea and do a series of pieces from it. The pieces may relate in form and vary in surface treatment.

All of the pieces were done with the exhibit in mind, she said. They are an accumulation of work from the past 1½ year's work.

Robertson has shown her work in two student comprehensive exhibits and in Northwest Missouri State University art club shows. She attended Northwest Missouri State before coming to K-State.

Sally Thomas and Caren Rhodes will present their BFA exhibitions in the McCain Auditorium galleries.

Thomas, who has an emphasis in painting, will present about 20 pieces. Most of the works will be acrylic on canvas. She may also exhibit several drawings.

All of her pieces are connected in a magical, fantasy sense, she said. A lot of the paintings are of interior objects. The later pieces are outdoors, but all are treated as fantasy. She uses bright colors in her pieces.

The pieces displayed are the culmination of work done during the past two years, Thomas said.

Rhodes will present 15 pieces in her exhibit. She has an emphasis in drawing and will present both drawings and paintings in the show.

Rhodes uses primarily oil in her paintings and draws with graphite and Prisma colored pencils, along with pastel.

One figurative painting and a figurative drawing done in Prisma pencil and pastel will be included in the show, she said. The pieces were also exhibited in a student comprehensive earlier this year. In addition, Rhodes has displayed her work in Wichita.

Kevin Bailey, whose emphasis is in ceramics, will present his BFA exhibit in Ambry Gallery in West Stadium.

Bailey said he will show 10 to 12 pieces, all wheel-thrown pots. Some will be altered forms and some traditional.

The altered forms are abstract pieces that have been made asymmetrical rather than symmetrical, he said.

One of the pieces that will be in the exhibit received the honorable mention award in this year's student comprehensive. It is an altered wheel-thrown form that has been fired with volcanic ash.

Bailey has shown his work in three other student comprehensive exhibits. In October he exhibited at the Salina Art Center.

In addition to this exhibit, Bailey said he will present a variety of work in the final BFA display to run July 26-27 in the Union Art Gallery.

Gallery holds Southwestern art symposium

"Mimbres Pottery: Ancient Art of the American Southwest," a comprehensive collection of unique native American art, is currently featured at Kansas City's Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art. The exhibit will run through June 3.

Included in the exhibition are approximately 125 painted Mimbres bowls which have become a "spirit line" between the Mimbres people and today's culture.

A symposium on April 28 at the museum will focus on the Mimbres pottery. Patrick Houlihan, director of the Southwest Museum in Los Angeles, will begin the series of lectures at 10 a.m. with his presentation "Southwest Indian Pottery: An Introduction."

Following his lecture, time will be provided for viewing the Mimbres exhibition and Southwest pottery display from the Nelson-Atkins permanent collection.

The Mimbres people and their art will be discussed at 1 p.m. by Steven LeBlanc, curator of archeology at the Southwest Museum and director of the Mimbres Foundation, in a lecture titled "Mimbres Pottery in Context."

Tony Berlant, an artist who was instrumental in establishing the Mimbres Foundation, will be closing the symposium with his lecture "Mimbres Pottery as Art Form."

LeBlanc and Berlant are curators of the current exhibition.

Following the final lecture, the three symposium speakers will be available for informal discussion. Symposium tickets are $6 and may be purchased in advance.

From the sixth to the 12th centuries, the Mimbres people lived in small farming villages in the isolated valley of the Mimbres River in what is now southwest New Mexico. It is not known what the Mimbres people called themselves, but the name given them is the Spanish word for willows — referring to the trees that grow along the central stream of their territory.

During this period, the Mimbres people developed a painted pottery tradition which evolved from a plain brown undecorated ware into a figurative black-on-white bowl.

The bowls frequently depict narrative scenes of Mimbres activities such as hunting, fishing, games, rituals and dances, as well as a wide variety of wildlife that lived in the Mimbres Valley — insects, birds, fish, reptiles, rabbits, deer, sheep and antelope. Also portrayed are mythological figures and creatures of fantasy. The painted pottery was designed for storage, cooking, hauling water and special social and ritual occasions. Although only a small percentage of the pottery was interred, the most impressive bowls are usually found in burials.

The interior surfaces of the later bowls are enhanced by elaborate geometric and figurative designs painted in black or red on a white background. While the artisans used a limited set of geometric motifs — spirals, key figures, cross-hatching, checkerboards, triangles, circles and squares — these elements appear in endlessly varied combinations and are often integrated with pictorial imagery.

There seems to be a rule these days that says all popular fantasy and comic book characters of the past now have to be resurrected and brought to the screen in new, glossy editions.

"Superman," "The Lone Ranger," "Flash Gordon," "Popeye" and many others have fallen to this rule. Even Broadway has succumbed by allowing Little Orphan Annie to take center stage.

There is a built-in market for these films. Their popularity is usually assured through everyone's familiarity with the story. People don't want to risk throwing $4 down on a movie they may not like, so they go for sure bets.

The best of these films have remained true to their comic book or fantasy origins, but a surprising number of the film makers have felt it necessary to belie a story's origins to go for a more realistic look. This is what director Hugh ("Chariots of Fire") Hudson goes for in the newest entry in this film genre. In "Greystoke: The Legend of Tarzan, Lord of the Apes," Edgar Rice Burroughs' general plot and characters have been borrowed, but the results bare little in common with Burroughs' stories.

If one can get past Hudson's misinterpretation of the story and consider the film on its own merits, it can be seen that "Greystoke" has a lot going for it. Hudson has tried to lift the material above its origins in fantasy, and in the process make it allegorical, but even his heavy-handedness can't disturb the charm in the film's best moments.

Review

After some 20 years pass, a jungle expedition stumbles upon a group of local natives who promptly shish kabob the intruders. Only one man escapes. He is wounded, though, and lies down to die, only to be soon awakened by a loinclothed, white-skinned man hovering over him. Clayton takes the wounded Belgian, d'Argent, and cares for him. After d'Argent discovers the treehouse, he realizes that his inarticulate savior must be John Clayton II. He attempts to teach Clayton how to speak, and because Clayton is such an accomplished mimic of jungle sounds, speaking is easy to learn. At this point, d'Argent convinces Clayton to follow him back to civilization and claim his rightful place as heir to the Greystoke fortune.

Up to this point "Greystoke" is a very ingenious piece of entertainment. Hudson's attempt to make the film realistic can never quite shake the sheer fantasy of the plot. And this is to the film's advantage, allowing it not to seem overly serious. Once Clayton and d'Argent travel to England, the fantasy elements almost completely disappear. The film then loses much of its charm.

Without the dynamic presence of Ralph Richardson as the old Earl who is enthralled to have Johnny back home, "Greystoke" would have fallen flat. Richardson gives a very poignant performance that perfectly captures a feel for the eccentricity of the Earl. He is able to keep the audience's attention long after the plot has given way to heavy-handed preaching about the evils of civilization.

"Greystoke" carries a $22 million price tag. In the jungle scenes the money was wisely spent. The troop of gymnasts, acrobats, dancers and actors who donned the chimpanzee suits are all quite convincing. The sets in the jungle are quite breathtaking as well.

If the latter half had been filmed with as much imagination as the first half, "Greystoke" would have been quite a film. But "Greystoke" is never quite successful in developing the plot. Part of the problem stems from the audience's familiarity with the story; any attempt at moralizations lack subtlety.

"Greystoke" does emerge as being enjoyable, despite its flaws, and even becomes quite brilliant in its atmospheric recreation of the jungle. One can only wish all of the film had the promise of its first half hour.

Soccer Club to defend title

After a successful spring season, the K-State Soccer Club will participate in the Big Eight Championship tournament to be held this weekend in Ames, Iowa.

Because of the success of the spring season, the squad has a good chance of winning its second straight conference crown, forward Kurt Krusen said.

The team is coming off a first-place finish at the University of Kansas tournament at Lawrence last weekend. With a 2-1 win over KU and a 1-0 victory over the University of Missouri at Kansas City, K-State capped an undefeated spring season.

Krusen said that MU and the University of Colorado should be K-State's top competition at the conference tournament.

"Missouri and Colorado are always the toughest teams in the conference," he said. "We've only beaten Colorado once in six years, and along with Missouri, they are traditionally the strongest program in the conference."

K-State will be in the same half of the tournament bracket with Colorado, Iowa State University and KU.

"Missouri should win their half of the bracket with no problem," Krusen said. "We'll have to play well to win our half."

Krusen said the team will have to overcome a lack of depth — which is its biggest problem — to win the tournament.

"The fact that you play five games, with only 30-minute halves, means you have to go all out in the tournament," he said. "Our lack of depth is going to be our biggest problem."

Continued fine play by goalie Akram Al-Ani and midfielder Kevin Umidon are what K-State needs to win the tournament, Krusen said.

KU relays to begin today

The Kansas Relays, to be held today and Saturday at the University of Kansas, is the first of four meets that will lead the K-State men's and women's squads to the National Collegiate Athletic Association indoor championships.

"Hopefully, we will get some good running weather (at the KU meet)," Head Track Coach Steve Miller said. "We need to try and get the most people we can to qualify for nationals so everyone will be running in their natural events."

Miller said he expects Donna King to qualify in the 100- and 200-meter dashes, both Betsy Silzer and Jacqueline Struckhoff in the 5,000-meter run and Anne Stadler in the 1,500-meter run.

"Historically, the KU relays were mostly just relays, but now it offers more individual events, and I'm glad," Miller said. "I'm anxious to see how our people compete. There will be many qualifying teams participating in the meet."

Royals end Detroit winning streak

By The Associated Press

DETROIT — Frank White belted a two-run homer, and the Kansas City Royals ended the Detroit Tigers' winning streak at nine games with a 5-2 victory Thursday.

Rookie Bret Saberhagen, 1-0, held the Tigers to six hits and one run over the first six innings to pick up the victory with relief help from Dan Quisenberry. Saberhagen walked two and struck out four.

Quisenberry started the seventh and earned his fifth save, despite allowing a ninth-inning homer to Kirk Gibson.

Detroit's Dan Petry, 2-1, gave up eight hits while striking out four and walking two in eight innings.

Jorge Orta and Hal McRae each drove in a run in Kansas City's two-run third inning.

University professor researches, documents weather data for state

By RHONDA BROWN
Collegian Reporter

Spring weather, with its unpredictable rainy and sunny periods, makes the local weatherman someone people love to hate.

"Many people think of a meteorologist as a weather forecaster, and there are many people, myself included, who are not forecasters and who have never forecasted," said Dean Bark, professor of physics and climatologist for the Kansas Agricultural Experiment Station.

Climatology is a branch of meteorology; it is the physics and mathematics of the atmosphere, Bark said.

He has been a consultant for researchers on campus since 1956.

"There are a bunch of people who are researching irrigation scheduling, insect pest management, crop development and this sort of thing," Bark said. "We (climatologists) interpret what they (researchers) want and need in the way of weather data."

"We have a complete set of climate records for the state of Kansas. They are the most extensive set of records in the state," Bark said.

Since the Federal Climatological Service Program was abandoned in 1973, Bark has found himself doing much extra work.

"I feel a little bit like a librarian who doesn't want you to use anything because you'll get it out of order," Bark said. "We try to keep it (data) all filed and sorted. That takes more of our time than we would like.

He said he believes that people do not realize the amount of effort and money that is required to obtain quality weather data. Therefore, the public thinks weather data should be provided by "the government" and should be free for the asking, he said.

"People think they ought to be able to call up (the climatologist office) and somebody should give it (weather data) to them," Bark said.

"I'm always a little bit upset at consultants who call me and want me to provide them free data that they are going to sell to their clients."

"We would like more time for more 'real' climatology instead of just service work," he said. "I would like to use data and not work with getting it, but since there is nobody doing that here in the state of Kansas, we are maintaining their files (Federal Climatological Service files)."

One of the current efforts of the climatologist office is gathering information through automatic recording stations located at research stations. The climatologists also are trying use phone lines to obtain and use information which can be classified as real time data. Real time data is current and used immediately for current field conditions.

"The National Weather Service has done this for the aviation industry for a long time," Bark said. "Everything they take is geared toward the aviation industry, and so we hope to provide information for the special needs of agriculture."

Agricultural researchers need information about solar radiation and solar temperatures, which aren't taken regularly by the National Weather Service, he said.

"We want to hook this data into computers and individual fields with microcomputers so that researchers have access to this data and can use it on a real time basis," Bark said.

Much of the work done at K-State is on the basis of regional studies. Bark has counterparts throughout the northcentral United States.

"The weather we have in northern Kansas is no different than they have in southern Nebraska, and eastern Kansas is the same as western Missouri," he said. "When storms move across, they don't stop at the state line. Just because in your geography book Kansas is yellow, Nebraska is green and Missouri is pink, they really aren't that different."

A very frustrating area of climatology is that some people are uneducable, Bark said.

"When I came here I would hear farmers' almanac (predictions) and old wives' tales. I thought, 'Well good, all I'll have to do is set them straight,'" he said. "I'll explain to the people logically that those aren't true and here is the real reason (for weather occurrences) based on a good physical background."

"I'm a little disillusioned because people aren't willing to listen," Bark said, "but I guess if I reflect back, many people are educable and I have gotten across some things in my 30 years."

Hyatt suit litigants reach accord

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Hyatt Corp. has reached an out-of-court settlement with the designers and builders of the Hyatt Regency hotel, resolving a lawsuit that had raised the prospect of allocating responsibility for the 1981 collapse of two sky walks in the hotel's crowded lobby.

By agreement of the parties in the suit, filed in December, the terms of the cash settlement were not disclosed. Hyatt had sought $4 million for damages to its reputation, the costs of temporarily closing the hotel, reduced income when it reopened and legal expenses.

"Hyatt has been vindicated of having any responsibility at all for the tragedy," Thomas Deacy Jr., a Kansas City lawyer representing the Chicago-based hotel chain, said Wednesday. "And Hyatt's position as a victim of this tragedy has been established."

Two suspended walkways collapsed in the hotel's lobby July 17, 1981, during a crowded Friday-night dance, killing 114 people and injuring more than 200.

Settlement of the Hyatt Corp.'s lawsuit was reached late Tuesday or early Wednesday, according to Robert Babcock, an attorney for Eldridge & Son Construction Co., the hotel's general contractor.

Hyatt contended in the suit that faulty design and construction of the hotel sky walks resulted in their collapse.

The resolution of Hyatt's claims lessens — and may eliminate — the likelihood of a distribution among the hotel's builders and designers of responsibility for the collapse, according to lawyers involved in the litigation.

"I'm certain a good part of their motivation (in settling) was to avoid a trial or some objective determination of fault," Deacy said.

The 12 defendants did not divide responsibility for the disaster in the course of the settlement discussions, said Babcock, who coordinated negotiations for the defendants.

U.S. government issues employee credit cards

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — It took three decades to do it, but Uncle Sam finally has a credit card.

Within three years, there are likely to be 350,000 or more federal employees saying "charge it" — to the tune of more than $4 billion a year.

One of those employees, Vice President George Bush, appears with his card on the cover of "Management," the magazine published by the U.S. Office of Personnel Management which includes an article explaining the use of the cards in its current edition.

With the federal government carrying a debt of $1.5 trillion, a new way to borrow money would appear to be the last thing Uncle Sam needs. But this frenzy of credit card use is expected to save money — up to $200 million a year.

The General Services Administration, which is spearheading the credit card conversion, says it will bring procedures for the world's biggest group of travelers into the 20th century.

At any one time, the old joke goes, there are 20,000 bureaucrats up in the air. The tab for all of those airplane flights, restaurant meals and hotel rooms is running over $3.5 billion annually. And it goes up every year.

The GSA had been toying with the idea of paying for travel with credit cards since they first gained popularity in the 1950s. But bureaucratic inertia and legal obstacles always thwarted a changeover.

All of the ideas had a common approach — thousands of credit cards issued to the federal government and then handed out to employees. Lawyers feared that cards handled this way would open avenues for unscrupulous employees to team with crooked hotel operators to bilk the government.

In addition, a limited experiment using charge cards issued by car rental agencies collapsed of its own weight. Administrative costs skyrocketed as the government tried to sort out all the pieces of paper.

"The accountants just went bonkers when you mentioned a centralized credit card system," said William F. McDade Jr., GSA's deputy transportation director.

But GSA Administrator Gerald Carmen, convinced that the proper system would spell tremendous savings, ordered a new look at credit cards last year.

"He said, 'Don't tell me why it can't be done. Tell me how it can be done,'" McDade said.

GSA officials came up with a novel approach. Instead of issuing cards in the name of the government, why not issue each card to the employee, making him responsible for paying the bill. The employee would submit an expense voucher after the trip and get reimbursed.

Since employees already had to submit the vouchers to account for cash advances, the government would be able to rely on a proven system to keep tabs on travel expenses.

GSA put the proposal out for bid last summer and awarded the contract to Diners Club. The agreement, industry analysts say, was beneficial to both sides.

For years, Diners Club has lagged behind its major rivals. Where American Express has 17.5 million cardholders, Diners Club and its smaller sister Carte Blanche, both owned by Citicorp, have 5 million cardholders.

All the card companies are seeking ways to increase the amount charged on their cards — since merchants pay a percentage of each charge to the card companies and these fees represent the major source of revenue.

For Diners Club, the fee ranges between 2 percent and 5 percent, translating into revenue of between $80 million and $200 million on $4 billion worth of government travel.

With that much money at stake, GSA officials said, Diners Club readily agreed to two contract stipulations. It waived its normal $45 annual membership fee, something it does anyway for corporate accounts with 100,000 or more cards, and it agreed to issue cards without credit checks on federal employees.

Wheat classification causes debate

By LINDA MORRELL
Collegian Reporter

Developments of wheat varieties which are difficult to classify as either hard or soft is a controversial issue among K-State researchers, Federal Grain Inspection Service officials, farmers and elevator grain inspectors.

FGIS officials last week refused to classify a group of red wheat which includes wheat types difficult to classify, such as Arkan wheat developed at K-State.

"I don't think it's a matter of the FGIS being opposed (to the new varieties), but an expression of concern to correctly identify them," said Kurt Feltner, associate dean of agriculture and associate director of the Kansas Agricultural Experiment Station. "I sense they're ready and willing to change."

Wheat identification is determined by visual characteristics, but because different factors cause these characteristics to vary, new means of classification are necessary, he said.

The experiment station has received $100,000 from the Kansas Legislature for research development of criteria for objective tests as opposed to visual tests.

Research is underway, Feltner said, but "is fickle and will take time."

Environment plays a large role in wheat characteristics, said James Shroyer, assistant professor of extension agronomy.

Different growing conditions, such as the weather, vary the look of the kernels, he said.

Arkan, for example, a hard red winter wheat variety, has kernel morphology (shape) similar to soft wheat.

Arkan and other wheat varieties are developed to increase resistance to insects and disease. The larger an area planted to one crop variety, the more susceptible the area becomes to these problems.

The problem with the new wheat varieties occurs when they can't be identified when inspected. Mixing of hard and soft wheat lowers the wheat grade and price, Shroyer said.

Warren Howland, manager of the Co-op elevator in Manhattan, said there are two methods of determining whether wheat is hard or soft — holding the truck on the scales for 15 minutes or purchasing an expensive machine to do the work.

The three or four Arkan users in this area have already been identified by elevator personnel, he said, and their grain will probably be stored separately. However, the Arkan users will be encouraged to convert to another hybrid.

The issue of the grain identification is "blown completely out of proportion," Howland said. Grain companies are already advertising they'll take Arkan, and as a result are quieting the situation.

Mixture of hard and soft wheat can also cause problems for the baking industry.

Soft and hard wheat do not go through a flour mill in the same way, said Charles Deyoe, head of the Department of Grain Science and Industry.

Arkan, though, has been found to have a 1 percent higher protein content than the popular Newton wheat variety.

Hard wheats are used in breads, while soft wheat is used in cake and cracker production.

Virus discovery may prompt work on AIDS vaccine

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Government scientists have found the virus that probably causes AIDS, a discovery that has led to a blood test for the deadly disease and the possibility of developing a vaccine within two or three years, federal health officials announced Monday.

"The probable cause of AIDS has been found," Health and Human Services Secretary Margaret M. Heckler told a news conference.

Isolating the virus and developing a process to mass-produce it led to a test that should detect AIDS — acquired immune deficiency syndrome — in victims even before symptoms arise and tell if donated blood supplies are contaminated with the virus.

By identifying those carrying the virus and its presence in blood, "we should be able to assure that blood for transfusion is free from AIDS," Heckler said. "With the blood test, we can now identify AIDS victims with essentially 100 percent certainty."

Dr. Edward N. Brandt, assistant HHS secretary for health, said the test should be widely available within six months to screen donated blood, suspected to be a source of the agent that causes the disease that destroys the body's immune system.

Brandt said the discovery should spur work on a preventive vaccine, which could be ready for testing within two to three years.

"What we have at the moment is not of particularly great benefit to those with the disease right now," Brandt said.

Scientists at the National Institutes of Health, and particularly Dr. Robert Gallo of the National Cancer Institute, were given most of the credit for isolating the virus and devising the system to routinely detect and grow it, a major step for future research.

The officials said they are so sure about the strength of the U.S. findings, which closely parallel work by French scientists reported last week, that they can declare an AIDS breakthrough.

Four papers describing the work of Gallo and his many colleagues will be published this week in the journal Science.

According to Gallo and the papers, the causative virus appears to be a member of a family of viruses called human T-cell leukemia virus (HTLV) previously suspected of having a role in AIDS.

The researchers said the new virus, called HTLV-3, shares so many characteristics with other HTLV viruses that it has to belong to this family despite some structural differences.

Scientists said they suspect HTLV-3 is very closely related, if not identical, to the recently publicized AIDS candidate virus called lymphadenopathy associated virus (LAV), discovered last year by French researchers at the Pasteur Institute in Paris.

Police deport Libyan student involved in 'covert activity'

By The Associated Press

LONDON — Police investigating the shooting at the Libyan Embassy deported a Libyan student on Monday, saying he was involved in "covert activity." The day after Britain severed relations with Libya, diplomats in the capitals of both countries prepared to evacuate their embassies.

Libyan personnel at the besieged embassy in London, who have until midnight Sunday to leave the country, cabled their leader Col. Moammar Khadafy pledging "to defend our principles and aims... or die in the process," the official Libyan news agency said.

There was no clear assurance from Libya that those holed up inside the mission would come out peacefully.

Britain broke diplomatic ties with Libya Sunday night after a fruitless effort to draw out of the embassy the gunman who fired from the building at a crowd of Libyan dissidents April 17, killing a policewoman and wounding 11 demonstrators. The government ordered the 20 to 30 diplomats and students inside the embassy expelled.

"We will go on the last day, on the Sunday, in the afternoon," a man who answered the embassy phone told Press Association, Britain's domestic news agency.

The Foreign Office says there are 22 accredited Libyan diplomats, along with an unknown number of non-diplomatic personnel.

Home Secretary Leon Brittan said the departing Libyans will be searched for weapons, but their diplomatic pouches will not be touched. Police planned afterward to scour the building.

Fee-cost ratio of 25 percent maintained

Regents hear plan to increase tuition

The Kansas Board of Regents heard first readings Friday of a proposal to increase tuition by another 10 percent for the 1985-1986 school year at Kansas' doctoral universities — K-State, the University of Kansas and Wichita State University.

According to a report by the regents Special Committee on Tuition and Fees, the fiscal year 1986 tuition of $495 "is established so that the systemwide fee-cost ratio of 25 percent is maintained." The increase follows a 10-percent tuition increase approved last May for 1984-1985.

Under the tuition package, students attending doctoral universities will provide approximately 26.5 percent of the cost of education at those institutions. Students currently attending the three universities pay $410, or 27.5 percent of the cost of their education.

Students attending one of Kansas' three regional universities — Emporia State University, Fort Hays State University and Pittsburg State University — will face an approximate 17 percent increase to bring their tuition costs to $415.

The tuition increase at regional universities will bring the fee-cost ratio to 20 percent for those institutions. Students currently attending regional universities pay $355, or 18.6 percent of the cost of education.

Tom Rawson, director of planning and budget for the regents, said the convergence of fee-cost ratios paid at doctoral and regional universities does not reflect a trend toward charging a single fee-cost ratio for all Kansas universities.

"There are no plans, currently, to charge more than 20 percent (at regional institutions). The regents felt 20 percent was an appropriate figure for the regional institutions," Rawson said.

According to the report, the new tuition includes a $12 charge which will eliminate all existing academic service, laboratory and departmental fees except fees for individual music lessons, fees assessed to cover breakage and fees associated with geography, geology and other such field camps.

The 1985-1986 tuition rate also provides for a $60 differential between graduate and undergraduate status at the doctoral universities. A graduate/undergraduate differential of $50 will be incurred at regional universities.

Graduate students to date have paid the same tuition as undergraduate students, but the regents approved a plan last May for graduate students to start paying a $40 differential in fall 1984. The tuition increase for graduate students reflects the cost difference between undergraduate and graduate instruction, according to the report.

Rawson said everyone — including students and university presidents — was given a chance to speak on the proposal, but no one suggested any modifications.

High court hears draft registration arguments

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — An apparently sympathetic Supreme Court was told Monday the government is not inflicting unconstitutional punishment by denying federal aid to male college students who fail to register for the draft.

Solicitor General Rex Lee defended a 1982 law disqualifying non-registrants from receiving aid. He said the law legitimately was designed to coax students to register with the Selective Service.

A federal judge in 1982 declared the law unconstitutional, ruling it was an unlawful form of punishment imposed by Congress.

Lee, the government's chief courtroom lawyer, said the purpose of the law was "not to catch wrongdoers, but to increase the number (of young men) on the registration rolls."

He added that the law appears to be working. More than 300,000 students who previously had failed to sign up for the draft have done so since the act was passed, Lee said.

Draft registration — but not actual conscription — was reinstituted in 1980 under a law signed by then-President Jimmy Carter. Some 11 million young men, about 97 percent of those eligible, have registered since then, the Selective Service System says.

The law requires all male citizens and resident aliens born after Jan. 1, 1963, and between ages 18 and 26 to sign up with Selective Service.

The law, enacted in the aftermath of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, is designed to make it easier to draft young men if that becomes necessary.

The justices had few questions for Lee. But they shot queries etched in obvious skepticism at his adversary, William J. Keppel of the Minneapolis Public Interest Research Group.

The group successfully challenged

Center of Excellence to investigate robotics

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

The Kansas Board of Regents approved K-State's plans Friday to develop a Center of Excellence involving exploration into the advanced state of robotics.

Robert Kruh, dean of the Graduate School, said the center will emphasize research into the advanced state of the arts in engineering and computers. Two other regents institutions, the University of Kansas and Wichita State University, were granted permission to develop similar centers during a previous regents meeting.

Kruh said the Kansas Legislature in 1983 granted funds to strengthen the regents institutions. K-State received $130,000, he said, which will provide partial funding for the center.

"A lot of times these funds go toward 'agriculture programs because K-State is strong in that field," Kruh said. "We were able to establish good prospects of getting outside matching money in engineering and computer instead of agriculture in this instance."

Kruh said state law requires institutions to find an outside source not related to the University to provide matching funds for the center. He said negotiations are currently being held with a computing corporation for an estimated $195,000 which will dictate the speed of the center's development.

"It will require our receiving matching money, which is presently under negotiations," Kruh said. "I've heard it looks good, and hopefully everything should be nailed down in four to five weeks."

Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering, said financing plans are on schedule and he is optimistic of what the program can achieve.

"I think it can help us, there's no doubt about it," Rathbone said. "Financially I think we're doing fine and coming up with the dollars necessary."

Kruh said the KU center will be involved with the study of pharmacology, which deals with research of pharmaceutical drugs. WSU's center, he said, also will involve robotics but will emphasize the transfer of the current state of the art.

Dr. Joe McFarland, regents director of academic affairs, said it was the similarity between the WSU and the K-State program which caused the regents' delay in granting K-State permission for its center.

"We didn't want the centers duplicating each other," McFarland said. "We did realize that naturally there would be a certain amount of overlap between the two programs, and we felt that no one center could singularly respond to the computer needs of the state."

McFarland said the two institutions also will develop some type of official liaison to ensure that the two programs remain complementary.

Student collects Titanic trivia, memorabilia

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

Shortly before midnight April 14, 1912, the gigantic luxury liner, Titanic, rammed into an iceberg and sank in the frigid waters off the coast of Newfoundland.

But through Bryant Hindman, junior in construction science, and approximately 2,500 worldwide members of the Titanic Historical Society, the ship still floats in an ocean of books, models and other memorabilia.

"It started for me when I was in the third grade," Hindman said. "I was really interested in icebergs and I read this book about the iceberg which sank the Titanic. I talked to some friends and read up on it more and it kind of snowballed to where I am now."

What it has "snowballed" into, he said, is not only his membership in the society, but also nine years of collecting Titanic items which now cost him about $150 a year. It was after completing a Titanic model that Hindman joined the society.

"I bought this model of the Titanic for $75 in high school," Hindman said. "It's about three feet long and has working lights and the whole bit. It was pretty delicate work, so it took me about three years to build."

On the box of that model Hindman saw information regarding membership into the society and sent in his application during his freshman year at K-State.

While serious about the organization, Hindman talks almost tongue-in-cheek about a 50-page test he had to take and an active pin he received as a member which he said, "I always wear by my fraternity pin."

Another important motivator for Hindman was watching the movie "A Night to Remember," which was based on the sinking of the Titanic.

"There was a lot of stuff in the movie which doesn't quite follow

Architecture students win awards

The K-State chapter of the Association of Student Chapters of the American Institute of Architecture, along with the University of Kansas chapter, recently co-sponsored a Central State Regional Conference.

Eight Midwestern schools participated. The theme for the program was "Hands-on Architectural Presentation Technique," and the major event of the weekend was to design a bank. Three hours were allowed to complete the project.

Two K-State students tied for second place with their designs. Steve Hackman, senior in pre-design professions, and Martin Myer, senior in architecture, each won $200 for their efforts. Theresa O'Connell, junior in pre-design professions, won honorable mention for her design of the bank. A KU student received $500 for his first-place design.

Distinguished vet teacher chosen

Rodney Ferguson, associate professor of small animal surgery, has been chosen by students in the College of Veterinary Medicine as the "Distinguished Veterinary Medicine Teacher of the Year."

Ferguson was cited at a banquet for the 1983-1984 Distinguished Teacher and Senior Honors Awards last week.

A member of the K-State faculty since 1979, Ferguson teaches small animal surgery to veterinary students, performs surgery on small animals, researches canine cancer and trains students and interns for board certification. He received a doctorate degree in veterinary medicine from Ohio State University and master and doctorate degrees from Colorado State University. He is a diplomat of the American College of Veterinary Surgeons.

In recognition of his honor, Ferguson was presented a plaque and cash honorarium by Robert Stear of Norden Laboratories.

Pianist to perform guest recital

Audun Ravnar, pianist and faculty member of the University of Nebraska at Lincoln, will present a guest recital and master class at K-State at 11:30 a.m. today in Danforth Chapel Auditorium.

The recital will feature compositions by Grieg, Ravel and Schumann. The master class for pianists will begin at 1:30 p.m. in the chapel.

Ravnar was hailed as one of Norway's foremost pianists following his performance at the Bergen International Music Festival.

His appearance at K-State is sponsored by the Mid-America State University Association as one of the association's honor lecturers.

Architects to discuss firm's work

"Projects and Practice in Canada" will be the topic for a College of Architecture and Design Faculty Lecture at 3:30 p.m. Wednesday in the Union Little Theater.

James Jones, head of the Department of Pre-Design Professions, and Sarah Lynn Garrett, senior in pre-design professions, will discuss their work with Canadian firm James S. Jones Architect Ltd., a practice with emphasis on residential design, facilities for the elderly and commercial interiors.

Activities celebrate Hispanic week

Bill Piatt, director of the Washburn University legal clinic, will speak on the importance of higher education to minority students at 3:30 p.m. today in Union 204. His talk is part of the Office of Minority Affairs Series on Career and Graduate Education.

His speech also is included in the fourth annual "Festival Hispano Americano" at K-State this week. The theme this year is "Impact '84: Hispanics Rising to Meet the Challenge."

Also today, a songfest is planned between 11 a.m. and 1 p.m. in the Union courtyard.

Wednesday the Union Food Service will prepare a Latin American breakfast, a Mexican lunch and a Puerto Rican dinner.

Thursday, Cornelia Flora, professor of sociology, will speak at 3 p.m. in Union 208 on "Latin Women in the '80s." The musical group "Caribe" will present an outdoor concert at noon north of the Union and will provide music for a dance at the Elk's Lodge beginning at 9 p.m. There also will be a talent show, entirely in Spanish, at 7 p.m. in the Union Little Theater.

Grasslands portray Dust Bowl solution

(Editor's note: This is the sixth of eight articles about little-known historical sites in Kansas. "Hidden Places" is a program of University for Man and K-State's Division of Continuing Education.)

By ADAM ROME
Contributing Writer

The grass is everywhere, wondrous, rust, green and blue. There is yellow, too — patches of wild gourds. Across the plain is a high plateau known for a century and a half as Point of Rocks, and the Cimarron, a wide and winding path of sand and sage brush. The rest is sun and sky.

This is, one thinks, the landscape as it was when Coronado wandered by on his way to Quivira, when Josiah Gregg watered here en route to Santa Fe.

But the look of the landscape is in part an illusion. The plateau is more ancient than civilization, and the river too, but the grass — the grass is just two generations old, the work of a handful of engineers and visionaries in Dust Bowl days, now a part of the 107,000-acre Cimarron National Grasslands in Elkhart.

Morton County, in the decade or so after World War I, was a booming place. The great ranches prospered, and the acreage plowed to wheat increased more than a hundredfold as prices rose and rose and rose. But the wind, drought, and depression soon changed all that.

As Wylie Gore recalls, the land by the early 1930s was almost worthless:

"We owned 1,000 acres and we had one cow, and we had to sell her because there wasn't enough green stuff, weeds, cockleburrs, grass or anything else, on the 1,000 acres, to feed one cow.

"And of course that sand used to have a scouring action; it was just like a sandblasting machine, that sand with 40 to 50 mile-an-hour winds blowing it, it would just cut off any vegetation; say today you had some nice green vegetation, well tomorrow it would just be cut off. That's just the way it operated."

The problem of the Dust Bowl demanded an immediate solution, and President Franklin Roosevelt soon established a bureaucracy to restrict production, make loans to farmers, help resettle the most desolately impoverished and encourage soil conservation.

But the president also authorized the Land Utilization Project, an ambitious and farsighted effort to buy submarginal lands — farms that were abandoned when the price of wheat fell or severely damaged by wind erosion and farms that were too small or too poor to work efficiently.

The purchased land was to be consolidated, stabilized and reseeded in grass. It was then to be held forever as a place for recreation and controlled grazing as an example to farmers of proper management techniques and a check against unrestrained and reckless plow-ups in the future.

It was hard work at first in Morton County. The fences had to be knocked down, the homesteads removed or bulldozed, the land leveled and listed. And it was, like much of the New Deal, a grand experiment.

The project scientists and engineers began without sure knowledge of the best reseeding techniques or the native composition of the grasses. They began without an adequate supply of seeds and knowledge of how best to obtain them.

"But the dust was just everywhere, piles and piles of it," H. Y. Cott remembers, "and so we planted weeds first, weeds! And there were a lot of times when we wished we could do more and do it faster."

Yet the experiment worked. And so the grass and the few old corrugated tin buildings that were once the project headquarters are now a kind of monument, a reminder of a little-known but worthy idea and the few good people who made the idea a reality.

And yet it is hard not to be also a little melancholy. Wallace Stegner describes the feeling in "Wolfwillow," as he explains his reluctance to seek out his childhood home, now part of a similar project in Saskatchewan:

"I can imagine myself bumping across burnouts and cactus clumps, scanning the dehumanized waste for some mark — shack or wind-leaned chicken coop, wagon ruts or abandoned harrow with its teeth full of Russian thistle — to reassure me that people did once live there."

"Worse, I can imagine actually finding the flat on which our house stood, the coulee that angled up the pasture, the dam behind which the spring thaw created our 'rezavoy' — locating the place and standing in it ringed by silence, while the wind fingered my face and whispered to itself like an old blind woman, and a burrowing owl, flustered by the unfamiliar visitor, bowed from the dirt mound of its doorstep, saying, 'Who? Who?'"

Carlin signs regents funding package

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin Monday signed a bill revising three state retirement systems and six more appropriations bills, including one with more than $600 million to run state Board of Regents institutions and one giving a Parsons man $36,000 compensation for being wrongly imprisoned.

The appropriations bill for the state's six universities and other regents institutions includes funding for 7 percent increases in both faculty salaries and operating budgets for the 1984-1985 school year — which is what the regents had sought but more than Carlin had recommended.

Carlin recommended faculty salary increases of 6 percent and operating increases of 5 percent. Boosting them both to 7 percent added $3.3 million to Carlin's budget recommendations made in January, but a budget conference committee early this month made other reductions in the universities' spending allocations so the total increase will be just $1.9 million.

The bill totals $616.4 million, without money for salaries for classified employees of the universities and other schools. That funding will come in a separate state pay bill which the Legislature will pass late this week.

The regents and their institutions received $597.7 million in the present fiscal year, including money for classified employees' pay.

Here are the amounts each of the institutions will receive under the bill, and how much they got in the current fiscal year, which included money for classified employees' salaries:

K-State to receive $151.5 million

— University of Kansas Medical Center: $159.1 million; $155.2 million.

— University of Kansas: $153.3 million; $149.9 million.

— Kansas State University: $151.5 million; $145.3 million.

— Wichita State: $60.3 million; $56.8 million.

— Fort Hays State: $25.6 million; $24.1 million.

— Emporia State: $25.0 million; $24.4 million.

— Pittsburg State: $23.0 million; $22.9 million.

— Kansas State Veterinary Medical Center: $8.4 million; $8.1 million.

— Kansas Technical Institute: $3.6 million; $4.4 million.

— Board of Regents: $6.5 million; $6.6 million.

The bill to pay claims against the state contains the $36,000 for Keith Carl, the 26-year-old Parsons man who spent 21 months in prison for armed robbery, a crime another man later confessed to committing.

Carlin vetoed by line item a $20,000 appropriation to repair and modify the upstream channel at Nemaha State Fishing Lake because the Legislature attached a provision the money could not be spent until the Fish and Game Commission adopted rules and regulations to standardize the issuance of warning tickets by game protectors.

"Even though the general intent of this provision might be desirable, the method of forcing the situation is unacceptable," the governor said in his veto message.

"I am concerned with the increasing frequency with which the Legislature endeavors to place in appropriations bills matters which are not germane to appropriations. Such a subject rightfully should be addressed in a separate bill."

Carlin also used the line item veto to strike down in the same bill two sections which reduced expenditures in the current fiscal year of the Department of Human Resources for salaries and for the Special Employment Security Fund.

"I will not agree to items which reduce the level of resources available to an agency late in the current fiscal year without the specific consent of the agency head," said Carlin.

Secretary of Human Resources Jerry Shelor, whose delay in being confirmed by the Senate this session was labeled as "purely political" by the governor.

Carlin signed the retirement bill at a ceremony attended by officials of the three programs — the Kansas Public Employees Retirement System, the Kansas Police and Firemen's Retirement System and the Judges Retirement System.

Major provisions of that measure include:

— Increase the state's contribution rates starting in Fiscal Year 1986, which begins July 1, 1985, from 4.6 percent to 4.9 percent for nonschool employees and from 4.3 percent to 4.4 percent for teachers and other school employees.

— Exempt member contributions from the employee's adjusted gross income so federal income taxes don't have to be paid on it until after the employee retires.

— Increase the benefits of those who retired from state jobs before July 1, 1981, by an additional 10 percent, and remove a July 1, 1987, expiration date which the Legislature had imposed on a 10 percent benefit hike which took effect on July 1, 1982.

— Increase from 1.25 percent to 1.4 percent of the final average salary for all years worked the amount of the benefit paid to retirees after July 1, 1989, who completed 25 or more years of service. For those with less than 25 years' service when they retire, the amount of the benefit will be 1.25 percent on the average for years worked prior to June 30, 1982, and 1.4 percent on the average for years worked after that date.

The other four appropriations bills signed by Carlin provide operating funds for next fiscal year for the state's agricultural agencies and a wide variety of state agencies, including the Departments of Education, Economic Development and Insurance, the Civil Rights Commission, Board of Tax Appeals and offices of the governor, attorney general, secretary of state and treasurer.

Largest amount in the bills was the $662.2 million appropriated for the Education Department.

The signings completed Carlin's action on all measures enacted by the Legislature before it recessed April 5. The Legislature reconvenes Wednesday for a three- or four-day wrap-up session.

Salvadorans prepare to choose president

By The Associated Press

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — The government is hoping for another big turnout for the presidential election runoff May 6 between moderate Jose Napoleon Duarte and ultra-conservative Roberto d'Aubuisson.

In the two other elections since El Salvador's civil war started in 1979, voters lined up by the tens of thousands.

A big turnout for the March 1982 election for a Constituent Assembly was considered a propaganda victory for the government, which promoted voting as a way to show their desire for peace. It was also seen as a display of ordinary Salvadorans' defiance of left-wing guerrillas who oppose the elections and refused to run candidates.

The first round of the presidential election, in March, was marred by bureaucratic foulups that prevented an estimated 200,000 people from voting. Nevertheless, the total turnout was 1.6 million of an electorate believed to number about 1.8 million.

Duarte defeated d'Aubuisson, 43.4 percent to 29.7 percent, but a runoff was necessary because with eight candidates running, neither got more than half the vote total.

Besides a genuine desire for peace and democracy on the part of many Salvadorans, there are subtle — and not so subtle — factors that prompt them to vote.

Voting is required by law in El Salvador, as it is in most other Central American countries. Violators can be punished by a fine ranging from the equivalent of 80 cents to $20. There is no evidence, however, that the law was enforced strictly in March.

In addition, a complicated election procedure designed to reduce the possibilities of fraud in the March election affected many voters.

Further, guerrillas, who did not participate and dismissed the elections as a farce, urged others not to cast ballots and indirectly threatened voters in some parts of the country.

There also were reports of harassment from members of d'Aubuisson's Republican Nationalist Alliance, known as ARENA.

There were similar pressures on voters two years ago in the Assembly elections, but this year it was easier to tell who had voted and who had not.

KU athlete files suit for injury

Craig Branstrum, a high-jumper from the University of Kansas, has filed suit against K-State for an injury he received at a track meet at R.V. Christian Track earlier this month.

The suit was filed in Riley County District Court for approximately $10,000.

In a telephone interview Monday, Branstrum said the main reason the suit was filed was to "preserve the pits."

"The only way to preserve the pits so that someone could examine them for faultiness was to file suit," he said.

Branstrum slightly injured his spinal cord because of the alleged faulty landing pit.

Gifts surprise department head

Although Naomi Lynn, head of the Department of Political Science, will leave K-State in June to take another job, her friends in the American Society for Public Administration have made sure that, like Dorothy and Toto, she will always have a way back to Kansas.

At a society dinner in Lawrence last week, John Nalbandian, director of the public administration program at the University of Kansas, presented Lynn with a piece of parchment containing the lines from "The Wizard of Oz" in which the Good Witch of the North explains to Dorothy how to get back home.

"All you have to do is knock the heels (of the red ruby slippers) together three times and command the shoes to carry you wherever you wish to go," was the witch's advice.

To effectively use this information, Lynn also received a red-papered box with a yellow brick road on the lid containing a pair of red ruby slippers.

"I was very, very surprised," Lynn said. "It was a very nice gesture. Every time I look at them, they will certainly remind me of Kansas."

Lynn will leave at the end of June to take a position at Georgia State University as the dean of the College of Public and Urban Affairs.

She said she tapped her shoes at the dinner, but probably will not do it much in the future because the shoes are at least a size too small. Lynn said she would probably mount the shoes above a frame containing the parchment she received.

Flint Hills offer peace, serenity

Some things happen but once a year. Christmas, Thanksgiving and Easter all fall into this category. Yet another seasonal rite of passage happens only once annually: the burning of the Flint Hills.

Along the winding Kansas Highway 177 the past weekend, a motorist could find acre after acre of blackened prairie, mingled with patches of fire and smoke. The fires cover such a wide area that smoke generated by them floats ever skyward, forming a cloud that can be seen in areas far removed from the heart of the hills.

Spring is here.

Each year, probably for as long as the lush grasses of the Flint Hills have played host to cattle from the drier regions of Texas, cattlemen have burned the dead grass of the past year to allow new growth to take its place. By the time the cattle start arriving in the summer, the charcoal-colored landscape is replaced by a sea of green dotted with crystal-clear ponds and an occasional windmill.

The burning hills are imposing against the night sky. The dancing lines of flame often stretch from horizon to horizon, lending a deep orange glow to the murky darkness.

Isn't it indeed a blessing to live in a state where the calendar isn't the only means of distinguishing seasons? The recent cold, wet weather has justified a reminder that summer will come after all.

A drive in the Flint Hills is enjoyable all year. And the best part about the hills is their accessibility to Manhattan and other cities. A driver can leave the city for a few hours and use the hills as a barrier to the pressures of day-to-day life.

With the rigors of finals approaching, bear in mind the serenity and peace of mind the hills can afford. Then, take a road trip for a few hours and enjoy the break without straying far from pressing responsibilities.

Media overkill bores voters

Last week Gary Hart came to Independence, Mo., President Reagan made a campaign appearance at a Ford Motor Co. plant in Claycomo, Mo., and Walter Mondale visited the Kansas City area.

If these three presidential candidates were hoping to attract the attention of voters, they tried valiantly. But their visits succeeded mainly in capturing the interest of the media.

The press has nearly doused any public interest in the presidential race. It's a classic case of overkill — the average person can only stand to read so much repeated information about the candidates and endure the results of only so many primaries and caucuses.

What is the impetus behind so much press coverage? Ann Compton, an anchor-woman for ABC-TV, offered an interesting analysis in a press conference before she delivered a speech in Kansas City last week.

"Political seasons are so long because reporters don't want them to be over," she said.

Does the public really need or want to be subjected to so much information about the presidential race? Is such campaign hype only a media money-maker?

Journalists should learn some restraint in fanning the political fires. If the press hopes to fulfill its intention of informing the public, some balance must be met between sparking awareness and burning interest.

Idea exchange in Reagan's pocket

This spring the Lou Douglas Lecture Series on Public Affairs topic focused on Central America. One of the speakers invited was Sergio Ramirez, the second-highest official in Nicaragua. The University of Kansas also was interested, and later actually conducted negotiations to bring him to speak.

Ramirez accepted, but complications arose when he decided to extend his visit. He decided to accept, on the same trip, requests to speak at Harvard University, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Columbia University.

This was apparently unacceptable to the Reagan administration. Ramirez's visa, instead of being processed at the embassy level in Nicaragua, was forwarded to the State Department in Washington. Reportedly, the issue was decided in the White House itself. Ramirez (the equivalent of a foreign vice president) was granted tourist status and his visit was restricted to the state of Kansas.

Recently K-State President Duane Acker received a telegram in answer to the invitation:

Distinguished Sir:

I must inform you that I have been forced to cancel my trip to the United States. I must decline the gracious invitation extended to me by your University because the U.S. government has authorized a visa only for Kansas and only for a few days. This restriction is unacceptable to me and the Nicaraguan people.

The Nicaraguan government continues to search for constructive avenues with which the Reagan administration, by civilized means, may permit the attainment of a stable and lasting peace in this area of the world. This would permit the cessation of permanent aggression to which the Reagan administration has subjected our country.

Nevertheless, the U.S. government refuses dialogue between the two countries as well as denies U.S. citizens the opportunity to hear our side. On the other hand, we continue to welcome U.S. governmental envoys as well as senators and other representatives of U.S. society.

Rather than allowing us to present our point of view in the United States, the official policy continues to be one of mining our harbors and other acts of terrorism and aggression. Thus, the Reagan administration

DAN ROBISON
Collegian Columnist

tion will continue to act against the interests of the people of the United States and against peace and understanding.

Sincerely yours,
Sergio Ramirez Mercado

There are some questions surrounding this affair that I feel merit attention. First, shouldn't we consider our government's actions to be a violation of the First Amendment? The First Amendment protects the right to assemble and freedom of expression. In combination this constitutes the right to exchange ideas. Both we and Harvard have the right to hear Ramirez if we so desire. This right is being restricted.

Second, why was Reagan not concerned with Ramirez coming to visit Kansas? I believe that Reagan, intuitively, takes Kansans for granted. He knows that even if Ramirez came to speak, even if Ramirez made pure sense — it wouldn't make any difference. Few people would care to consider his point of view. Few people would come to hear him.

In effect, this is a form of self-censorship. People passively limit the number of ideas that reach them. It seems people feel somehow patriotic by not coming to programs or by not questioning the official line. Why can I say this? Let me cite an example.

This semester different organizations have hosted speakers that discussed the Nicaraguan issue. Although in essence we are at war with Nicaragua, the normal attendance can be expected to be around 50 people, or 0.25 percent of the University community. The highest has been around 500, or 1 percent of the population of Manhattan.

Other events here on campus indicate this form of self-censorship is not always passive. Student Senate, composed of eager heir apparents to the status quo, has apparently decided student funds should no longer foster a diversity of opinion on campus.

For example, senators cut from $1,800 to $1,000 the funds used by the International Coordinating Council to sponsor speakers. The ICC exists for the express purpose of fostering exchange of international ideas.

In another example, the Coalition for Human Rights, allocated as much as $711 two years ago, was recommended by the Finance Committee to receive $0 this year. The rationale given is that the coalition is a political organization.

I find this puzzling because funding has been increased for two other political groups: Student Governing Association and the Associated Students of Kansas. The latter has little function but to serve as a political lobbying organization.

Well, the argument bounces back, these organizations are not partisan political organizations! But if human rights is a partisan political issue, and the coalition is on the side of universal human dignity, on what side does that put senate?

It is, their logic says, not partisan to lobby for the right to use recreational drugs. Yet it is partisan to lobby for human dignity.

Perhaps it is completely my own perception, but I feel it is not really human dignity that meets opposition locally and nationally. Rather it is the introduction and mere discussion of ideas, both new and old, that is perceived to be dangerous to the status quo.

When future historians perform an autopsy on this country, they will not find that it died from the Russian flu. Nor will it have succumbed to some little-studied Nicaraguan disease. No, the verdict will be death by drowning — in a sea of self-inflicted ignorance.

Ethics absent in coverage of greek events

Editor,

Re: Lee White's editorial, "University must quiet greeks," in the April 19 Collegian:

As a fellow journalism major, may I say the news balance concerning the greeks this year hasn't teetered to one side — it has crashed on the side of negative.

The Collegian consistently ignores all that the greeks do for local and national philanthropies.

White's editorial was another demonstration of this uncaring concept of unbalanced news concerning greeks.

The Interfraternity Council has always cooperated with the Riley County Police Department and has even approached them asking that the greeks not be subject to special treatment. IFC's judicial powers concerning a misdemeanor such as noise is somewhat limited.

IFC is certainly not going to take up the practice of charter revocation due to excessive noise. Removal of a chapter's charter is very serious action. I would be horrified if a person was ever condemned from a city for a misdemeanor such as speeding, and I hold the concept of charter revocation in the same light.

Naturally, the neighbors want action taken for excessive noise generated by greek houses, and the greeks are beginning to listen to their requests for late-night silence by obeying the selectively enforced local laws concerning noise. But may it also be said that a great percentage of those residents surrounding greek houses knew of their presence before they purchased their homes.

Greeks have never been above the law. House presidents are very aware that they are held responsible for the actions of their fraternity.

White did indeed prove a valid point — he has become a "one-meeting expert" on the subject. This type of writing I had hoped had been removed from the Collegian editorial page. The angered arrogance of this style of editorial writing does nothing more than stir emotions. A good editorial writer will stir thought, not emotion.

I ask for nothing more than journalism ethics. Don't target a group simply because they are different from your practices. Being different does not mean being incorrect.

Also, if you pursue more anti-greek stories, may you research them better. Informing from ignorance will generate just one thing — a misled readership.

DJs should play listeners' song requests

Editor,

Re: Jim Cunningham's letter, "Radio format allows little time for requests," and Mike McCurdy's letter, "Song selection often limited," in the April 19 Collegian:

First of all, it is true that KSDB-FM does play requests and does use live DJs. In fact, it is the only station that has ever played one of my requests in the three years I have been in Manhattan.

But I usually only request songs on the Monday or Wednesday morning jazz programs because KSDB will not honor requests of popular music or any song they feel does not agree with their alternate programming ideas. I doubt that if I would request "Desperado" by the Eagles, KSDB would play it. It's probably on their list of songs not to play.

But at least McCurdy addresses Dix's complaint, although I don't feel it was aimed at KSDB. Cunningham never does really reply to the grievance stated by Dix.

If radio DJs constantly call out to the public for requests, they should have enough respect for their listeners to play them, or at least level with their callers on whether they might be able to play the request in the next few hours, instead of simply adding the request to some list that may not be played for days. I don't call in a request on Saturday to hear it played Monday morning.

That defeats the purpose of calling in a request in the first place.

Dix was apparently trying not to pick on any one station by not naming them. But I find it amusing that Cunningham feels all of us have common knowledge of the programming schedules of every radio station in or near Manhattan.

If computers don't play requests, then why do they ask for them? I agree with what Dix said. If a radio station asks for requests, they darn well better play them, or tell the caller they can't, no matter what station it is.

Editor,

I just want to let everyone know how truly amazed I am at K-State's ability to screw up just about anything, no matter how big or small.

A good example of the first would be Blumont Hall. When I was a freshman, they had just started to build that monstrosity. Now that it's finished, I want to know who was sniffing concrete mix. Not only is it the ugliest building on campus, but after spending hundreds of thousands of dollars, you cannot find a single pencil sharpener in it!

Now comes the infamous "Super ID." When I first received mine, I just knew someone had made a mistake. I've been black for most of the life (at least, that's what I gather), but I have never looked like that picture on my ID. All you can see is my teeth and glasses!

My ID has me so black that if the cops ever stopped me for a crime, I could give them my fingerprints with no ink! I look like an X-ray! In fact, I'm so dissatisfied with my card that now, if anyone wants to see it, I just flip it over and show them the black strip...why not? We're both the same shade!

Most people might think this is a small matter, but I beg to differ. When someone wants to see my "K-State ID," I feel my card is a reflection of the school and the spirit behind it. If I were to present my card the way it is now, I'm scared someone will say, "Oh! You're from San Quentin!" To which I would say, "No, K-State, where the food is better!"

Library policy hurts students

Editor,

I want to bring up the point about changes made by Farrell Library in checkout policies for graduate students. Until fall 1983, graduate students had the privilege of checking out books once, with no renewals needed periodically. We graduate students do a variety of things such as teaching, research, etc., and check out dozens of books.

When the library became more efficient with their computers, the policy was changed and the checkout time was restricted to 60 days. In the worst case, we pay very heavy fines. Because we are not used to the changes as a way of life yet, the dozens of books we check out accumulate huge fines.

I am sure most of the graduate students join me in this complaint, and I hope the library does something about easing their checkout policies.

ASK stance needs student support

This year Student Senate has tentatively allocated $596.20 to the Associated Students of Kansas at K-State. The statewide parent organization of ASK will receive 50 cents per full-time equivalent student, with the additional 10 cents coming from Reserves for Maintenance of Standing Programs.

Consequently, all K-State students can profit from ASK's lobbying endeavors, making it imperative that students vocalize their opinions.

On Wednesday, a bill proposing to raise the legal drinking age to 19 for 3.2 beer will be publicly debated in the Kansas Senate. ASK has designated opposition to this issue a top priority.

Alcohol abuse is prevalent among all ages. However, I and many other students feel that raising the drinking age will not alleviate such problems, but will attribute to more widespread abuse. Stricter enforcement of existing laws and additional education on alcohol abuse are the viable solutions.

There also is a question of rights. Eighteen-year-olds are considered adult enough to vote, pay taxes, enter into legal contracts and fight and die for their country. Yet the government is trying to deny young adults the privilege to drink 3.2 beer.

If this bill is adopted, the rights of Americans everywhere will be violated in the most blatant fashion. In 1973, hundreds of thousands of young adults were instrumental in passing the 26th amendment, granting 18-year-olds the right to vote. Now, only 11 years later, rights of young adults are being challenged.

The Governor's Committee on Drinking and Driving investigated this issue and concluded there was not enough statistical data or analytical facts to warrant an increase in the legal drinking age. As a matter of fact, the highest number of arrests of people driving while under the influence comes from the 21 to 24 age group, not the 18-year-olds.

Student government emerged from the riotous 1960s with a rebellious reputation. Recent trends tend to bestow more responsibility and credibility on student government. This is due to student concern, participation and organization.

Whether in favor of or opposed to this legislation, I challenge all students to use their voices to further the concerns and interests of students.

Proponents of this bill will speak from 8-9 a.m. Wednesday in Topeka. Opponents will speak from 9-10 a.m. There will be a bus outside the Union at 8:30 a.m. Wednesday to transport all interested students to Topeka. It will return by noon. I urge all concerned students to attend the debates on Wednesday.

If you support the position ASK has taken, please attend the debate to help present your concerns. Let's show the senators and representatives that young adults are interested in legislation that directly affects them.

Editor's note: Kendra Ponte, senior in radio and television, serves as a College of Arts and Sciences senator.

Two others to be arraigned soon

'Twilight Zone' director to stand trial

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — "Twilight Zone" director John Landis and two colleagues were ordered Monday to stand trial for the helicopter crash deaths of three actors by a judge who said Landis put his quest for "visual truth" ahead of safety.

Landis, special effects coordinator Paul Stewart, and pilot Dorsey Wingo, who handled the helicopter that crashed onto actor Vic Morrow and two child performers, will be arraigned May 8 on charges of involuntary manslaughter.

The decision was a blow to the movie industry — the first time a director had been ordered to stand trial for a death on the set. If convicted, the defendants could receive sentences of six years.

Municipal Court Judge Brian Crahan dismissed charges against two other members of the movie crew, associate producer George Folsey and unit production chief Dan Allingham. The judge said their actions did not intentionally place the two children on the set in danger.

Because the case was "unique in the annals of criminal law," Crahan said the decision had been difficult. He said he believed that Landis, in his quest for "cinema verite," placed realism on film ahead of considerations of danger to the actors.

Morrow, Renee Chen, 6, and Myca Le, 7 were killed July 23, 1982, when the helicopter crashed on them during a scene in which huge explosions went off as they ran through a mock Vietnamese village.

The scene was being filmed for the first of four separate segments that make up "Twilight Zone: The Movie," released last summer.

"All of the principals on the production had one object in mind, the creation of a final illusion which had dynamics, explosives, and a feeling of the awesome import of simulated eventual death and hopelessness," the judge said, reading from a 30-page decision. "The evidence is that none of the principals had any intention to harm, let alone kill, the two children and the one adult actor," the judge said. "Unfortunately, the attempt to obtain visual truth resulted in these deaths." Landis appeared shaken as the judge spoke, and said afterward he was relieved for Folsey and Allingham, but was "extremely disheartened that at this stage of the judicial proceedings, being innocent is not enough." Crahan presided over a preliminary hearing that ended April 9 at which the defense had claimed that the deaths were unforeseeable. The judge said the defense argument that misfiring of special-effects explosives caused the accident didn't directly address the real issue in the case. That argument "begs the essential question" as to whether the helicopter hovering so close to the explosives was in itself reckless and endangered innocent people. "This court believes a crime, to wit involuntary manslaughter, was committed in the filming of the final sequence," Crahan said.

He dismissed two of the counts against Landis, Folsey and Allingham because they were based specifically on child endangering laws. He said the prosecution would have had to prove that the two children purposely were exposed to special risks.

But he said Landis, Stewart and Wingo had "ample warning that the set was at least dangerous after the first two sequences were shot that night" at Indian Dunes Park, 40 miles north of Los Angeles.

"The pilot was aware of the potential danger in hovering the helicopter above the actors," he said.

After a long investigation, the National Transportation Safety Board ruled March 6 in Washington, D.C., that the "probable cause" of the crash was the helicopter's proximity to special effects explosions, which threw debris into the craft's tail rotor, causing the rotor assembly to fall off.

Hindman said he spreads his interest to other members of his fraternity house by holding Titanic parties. Donning a white captain's hat, he turned his house's (Alpha Tau Omega) latest rush party into a Titanic party and forced pledges to learn facts about the ship.

"Pledges have to sign actives' paddles," Hindman said. "My paddle has the letters RMS (Royal Male Ship) on it. Before I let them sign my paddle, they have to find out what RMS stands for. They usually have to read through some of my books to find out."

Hindman also said he's partly responsible for the recent expeditions to salvage parts of the Titanic, which is being conducted by Jack Grim, explorer and author of the book "In Search of the Titanic."

"The Titanic Historical Society is co-sponsor of the expedition," Hindman said. "Part of my $12.50 annual dues goes towards that, so I helped chip in."

While Hindman has organized his own unofficial Titanic society among friends at K-State mainly through parties and other means, he said he has written a few times to a girl at the University of Missouri who is also an official member.

Titanic

facts," Hindman said. "One of the biggest fallacies in the movie is the band playing 'Nearer to Thee' as the ship sinks. The band actually played a song called 'Autumn,' but that song didn't have any lyrics and the Hollywood guys wanted to have the people singing and holding hands as it sunk."

Hindman knows the most minute of details and trivia surrounding the accident. He said there were many things that contributed to the Titanic's demise.

"When the ship went down," he said, "the U.S.S. California was only 10 miles away. One guy on the California even saw the distress rockets being fired from the Titanic. They could have easily saved the Titanic."

Since the telegraph was relatively new at the time, there were no regulations concerning its use, and the wireless operators as well as the captain were asleep. The ship which finally arrived, the Carpathia, was 50 miles away and came upon the survivors about four hours later, Hindman said.

Another factor in the accident was that the Titanic's captain knew ice was in the area, so he strayed off course to avoid any icebergs. Hindman said one of the ways the crew detected icebergs was to watch the waves foam up against them, but on the fateful night the water was unusually calm so there was no such detection.

Reagan's visit to China may spur nuclear pact

By The Associated Press

HONOLULU — U.S. officials are optimistic that President Reagan and Chinese leaders will be able to sign an interim agreement on commercial nuclear cooperation between their two nations when the president visits China later this week.

But there would "have to be a firm commitment" from the Chinese to work out differences over the handling of nuclear waste products, said a senior administration official traveling with Reagan.

The president was conferring Monday with aides and receiving a briefing on the Soviet military buildup in the Pacific region, in preparation for his meetings in Peking.

Focusing on the Soviets, Reagan summoned Adm. William J. Crowe Jr., commander of the U.S. Pacific forces, to his suite at a luxury hotel overlooking the ocean.

"The Soviet capability and Soviet threat is of concern to us, the Japanese, and probably the Chinese," said one senior official accompanying Reagan.

The official, who spoke on the condition that he not be identified by name, said Reagan wanted to be prepared to discuss the subject with the Chinese.

The issue of the nuclear agreement, which could be worth $20 billion to U.S. contractors, has been an unanswered question as the president's arrival Thursday in Peking draws near.

U.S. officials have made clear that they would like to have a treaty of some sort ready for him to sign, although a major stumbling block over the handling of spent nuclear fuel seemed, until the weekend, to be insurmountable.

But one senior administration official said as Reagan arrived in Honolulu on Sunday that an interim agreement "is more than possible."

Chinese efforts to purchase nuclear technology from American firms have spurred negotiations that have been conducted over two years.

A U.S. law would require China to guarantee that no nuclear material will be reprocessed, enriched or otherwise altered in form or content without the approval of the United States, and that no fuel that could be used to make nuclear weapons may be stored in a facility that does not have American approval. The Chinese feel that control of the fuel is a matter of national sovereignty, administration sources said, although similar requirements are placed on all nations with which the United States has nuclear power agreements.

The senior administration official said any agreement Reagan would sign in Peking would only partly address this issue.

If an accord is worked out, it would be largely an "agreement in principle," and would leave for later the settlement of the contentious issue of nuclear waste disposal, he said.

The apparent progress on the issue reflects the interest of U.S. aides in being able to return home with an agreement.

Cerebral palsy victim quits effort to starve

By The Associated Press

TIJUANA, Mexico — Quadriplegic Elizabeth Bouvia, eating french fries and burritos, has apparently been talked out of her "suicide wish" two weeks after checking out of the California hospital where she waged a battle to be allowed to starve to death.

The 26-year-old cerebral palsy victim, who wanted to be released from what she called a life of agony, was at the Hospital del Mar in this border city, a desk clerk said Monday.

Dr. Ernesto Contreras, the hospital's medical director, had said earlier that Bouvia had left the hospital, but the desk clerk, who would not give her name, said Monday afternoon she was still there.

When asked again if Bouvia was a patient at the hospital, Contreras said, "I'll tell you tomorrow."

He told reporters he hadn't seen the woman, then added: "It depends on what she wants. Please be patient. It's her life that's at stake."

"She spent a few days here, then she left the hospital without any notice (last week)," said Contreras. "We were fighting with her to let us nourish her."

Contreras had earlier said he had been away for about 10 days and didn't know until he returned to the hospital Monday that Bouvia had left.

From the Tijuana hospital Bouvia went to the Motel Jardin Playas, where she paid nurses to care for her while she tried to starve, according to the San Diego Union. But when the nurses became nervous about possibly aiding a suicide, she spent Saturday night discussing her situation with friends before tearfully deciding to try to live, the newspaper reported.

At the motel, her first solid food in seven months included a Mexican sweet roll. She later had french fries and part of an egg and muffin, the newspaper said.

After eating at the motel, she returned to the hospital for treatment for an infection. While there, she ate two burritos for lunch, according to the newspaper.

"I think this change of mind points out the weakest point of her case," said Riverside County Counsel Barbara Milliken, who had fought against Bouvia's request for a court order to make Riverside General Hospital in Riverside, Calif., provide her with hygiene and medication while she starved.

"To seek, as she did, the state's assistance in a suicide would have been a gross, unjust use of the state's power," said Milliken.

Asked if she thought Bouvia would return to Riverside General for treatment, Milliken said, "I always have foreseen that as a possibility. If she comes back, admission would be on an emergency basis only."

The total cost of Bouvia's stay at Riverside General was $100,000, including $35,000 in legal expenses, she said.

When he heard Bouvia had decided to start eating, Contreras said he was glad.

"I told her she had much more to gain from living, and she promised me she would think it over," he said. "She's young. She's bright. She has many things to do with her life."

Contreras said he explained to Bouvia that getting ready for death required a lot of preparation.

"She was receptive. She promised me to wait," said Contreras. "My belief was she would little by little accept."

Rolling Stones' lawsuit concludes

NEW YORK — The Rolling Stones and their business manager from the 1960s settled a lawsuit Monday, agreeing the band will get its royalties promptly and the manager still will control valuable copyrights.

The rock'n'roll band was seeking a "commercial divorce" so it could take over the copyright to all of its pre-1970 songs, which are worth millions of dollars.

Lead singer Mick Jagger testified in federal court April 16 that former business manager Allen Klein constantly misled the group.

But the Stones agreed Monday that recording companies owned by Klein — a former manager of the Beatles who advised the Stones during the 1960s — still hold rights to music the group issued before 1970.

Klein agreed to pay the Stones' royalties on time.

Bryant to resume singing career

OKLAHOMA CITY — Singer Anita Bryant, who retired from the limelight after campaigning against homosexual rights in Florida, says her prayers tell her she's ready to resurrect her entertainment career.

Bryant, 43, a former beauty queen from Barnsdall, has spent four years "living quietly" and "letting the healing take place" after her fight against a gay rights ordinance and her 1980 divorce from Bob Green.

"We all make mistakes. I've grown a lot. I'm ready to press forward," Bryant told The Daily Oklahoman and Times.

"Reaction to my homosexual stand was difficult to take at times, but I expected it," the former Miss Oklahoma said. "What hurt the most was criticism from people who expected me to be perfect and were disappointed that I wasn't."

In Oklahoma City on Sunday for an appearance on a religious television show, Bryant, who is a vocal Christian, said she will begin to seek at least two bookings a month at conventions, concerts, state fairs or a television appearance.

Pope rests before 21st foreign trip

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy — Completing a busy schedule of Holy Week activities, Pope John Paul II flew by helicopter Monday to the papal villa south of Rome for a two-day rest.

"My stay here will be brief, just until Wednesday morning, then I will have to return (to the Vatican) to prepare for the trip to the Orient, to Korea and other places," the pontiff said.

On May 2, John Paul II will embark on his 21st foreign tour since he became pope in October 1978 — an 11-day trip that also will take him to Fairbanks, Alaska; Papua, New Guinea; the Solomon Islands and Thailand.

Operators resent monitored sales calls

By The Associated Press

BALTIMORE — The next time you call an airline for a reservation or a magazine company for a subscription, there may be a third party monitoring your call: a computer.

It's not what you and the operator say to each other that matters to the computer, it's how long you chat.

In a growing number of service industries, phone calls are monitored by computer to gauge employee efficiency, and some workers resent it.

A telephone operator in Baltimore with 16 years experience was fired recently because computerized records indicated her speed didn't meet the "Average Work Time" standard established by her employer, AT&T Communications, a subsidiary of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

Operator Maevon Garrett said AT&T officials told her "my quality of work was good...but I overextended myself to customers and stayed on the phone too long."

Garrett was later reinstated, with only a two-week suspension on her record, following a protest by the Communications Workers of America.

Computerized tracking of job performance continues, and not just in the phone company, which pioneered the concept.

"We have time standards for reservation agents," said Trans World Airline spokesman David Venz. "We have certain time standards in which we essentially expect agents to make a sale or conclude a call."

"We know what the average conversation time is for whatever activity you are doing," said Jacqueline Mutnansky, operations manager for the phone banks in Chicago that take magazine subscription orders for Time Inc.

She said Time's Telephone Marketing Response Center has a standard "call time" for each type of call.

"You should have processed a specific number of calls and averaged a certain phone conversation time," Mutnansky said.

Officials at TWA and at the U.S. Postal Service said employees are not fired or transferred for working too slowly, but a bad Average Work Time report can lead to retraining.

"We look at it as just a way to see who needs further training," Venz said. "We feel it's a perfectly accepted practice. It's just looked on as a good tool to make employees more productive."

Some employees don't consider it a good tool at all.

Average Work Time is "a hated concept nationally...It hits a real raw nerve," said Jeffery Miller, a national spokesman in Washington for the CWA, which represents telephone operators.

The phone company's evaluation procedure is an example of "how the computer can turn workers into a production line type," Miller said. He said it causes operators "to try to get rid of a customer real quickly — for instance those who stutter or can't speak English."

Eleanor Street, a union official who recently retired after 38 years as a telephone operator, said operators don't feel a sense of achievement in serving customers when the length of each call is timed.

"Just imagine working under that pressure five days a week...Imagine what this does to your soul," said Street. "What it does to customers is that they have become merely voices, someone to get rid of as soon as you possibly can."

Street, who remains president of CWA Local 2110 despite her retirement, said, "I was told when I was trained you take care of quality, you take care of accuracy, and quantity and speed will take care of itself."

Charles Thornton, assistant vice president at AT&T Communications, said operators' wages and training make up the most expensive part of providing service.

The company's "first and foremost objective is providing high quality service," Thornton said, but it's also "very important to make sure our costs are low."

At the Postal Service in Washington, spokeswoman Jeanne O'Neill said letter carriers are inspected annually by supervisors who accompany them to see whether "enough time has been allocated to deliver the mail."

O'Neill said the Postal Service also hires outside companies to conduct studies on how long certain sorting procedures should take.

"Letter sorting machine operators...are required to key in one piece of mail per second. And of course we're very careful to check their error rate," O'Neill said.

The president of Local 202 of the National Alliance of Postal and Federal Employees Union in Baltimore said he felt sorting one piece of mail per second was "too much."

"The employee's working conditions should be brought down to a point where he could be more relaxed and could be more accurate," said Clifton Harris, president of Local 202.

Management's response is that the quality of work is not overlooked in the quest for efficiency.

"It's not just speed, but accuracy that's factored into this and continuity of this accuracy and so on," said O'Neill of the Postal Service.

Mutnansky at Time said, "The quality of work is also measured, phone technique is evaluated...and so is) how polite you treat customers."

County jails may relieve overcrowding

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A special House Committee on Corrections recommended Monday that the Department of Corrections be directed to develop a plan for transferring inmates to county jails when prison overcrowding requires an emergency solution.

"We think there would be a great number of spaces available in local jails," said Rep. David Miller, R-Eudora, the committee chairman. A report released last week by the Legislative Division of Post Audit identified 67 spaces in 14 county jails which could be used to house inmates. But Miller said those spaces were under the jurisdiction of sheriffs who said they were willing to house prison inmates.

House Republicans have introduced a proposal which would allow the early release of inmates to relieve prison overcrowding in an emergency. But Gov. John Carlin and Corrections Secretary Michael Barbara have said the early release proposal is a poor solution to prison overcrowding.

The county jail proposal was one of several recommendations to the House Ways and Means Committee which the corrections committee voted unanimously to make at its last meeting. The corrections committee, appointed three weeks ago by House Speaker Mike Hayden, R-Atwood, was limited in the direct actions it could take.

House committee recommends plan

The corrections committee also recommended that a resolution be introduced to amend the Kansas Constitution to increase the state sales tax by one-half cent for one year to create a corrections trust fund.

A one-year, half-cent sales tax increase is expected to generate about $94.5 million. The interest earned on the trust fund would be used to finance corrections programs as well as prison construction and other capital improvement projects.

"People don't feel as bad about paying sales tax as they do property tax," said Rep. Keith Farrar, R-Hugoton, referring to Carlin's proposed constitutional amendment to raise the statewide property tax to finance prison construction.

Committee members said they put the proposal in the form of a constitutional amendment because they wanted to give Kansas voters an opportunity to decide whether a sales tax increase should be used for programs and construction to alleviate overcrowding in the Kansas prison system.

A constitutional amendment requires a two-thirds vote of both chambers — 84 votes in the House and 27 in the Senate — to put the issue on the August primary ballot.

The committee recommended that the Legislature pass Carlin's emergency capital improvement package for prisons, which included funds to renovate prison facilities to provide 192 additional beds for medium security inmates at the Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing and the Kansas State Industrial Reformatory at Hutchinson.

The committee endorsed appropriating the funds Carlin requested for planning a new 300-bed women's prison, but recommended the plan not be limited to a prison for women only. It also recommended funds for studying the feasibility of converting a state hospital to a prison.

It also endorsed a Senate-passed bill which would reduce the minimum sentences for less serious, non-violent crimes involving property.

The bill would repeal some of the provisions of a stiffer sentencing law passed by the Legislature in 1982 and reduce to one year the minimum sentences for Class D and E felonies.

The committee endorsed changes in the provisions of the bill which apply the minimum sentences retroactively to inmates sentenced since 1982.

The committee recommended that the sentencing judge review the cases of Class E, as well as Class D, felons in prison to determine whether their sentences should be reduced.

Other recommendations by the committee include:

— Creation of a 15-member Commission on Crime and Punishment to study and propose changes in probation, parole and sentencing statutes and practices.

— House passage of a Senate bill to provide additional grants to counties to ensure continuation of existing community corrections programs and encourage the development of new ones.

— Development of a pilot project by the Corrections Department to measure the merits of an intensive parole program. Members of the Adult Authority, the state's parole board, have said more inmates might be granted parole if they could be placed under more supervision than current parole programs offer.

Kassebaum officially files for second term

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — U.S. Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, who had announced her intention March 24, filed Monday in the secretary of state's office for Republican renomination to a second six-year term.

Kassebaum, 51, paid the $726 filing fee to make it official that she will seek another term — which she reiterated will be her last. When she won election in 1978, she said she would serve just two six-year terms, and has advocated legislation to limit the service of members of Congress to 12 years.

"After 12 years, it's hard for one to bring a freshness and a challenge to the position," the Republican senator said, adding that some lawmakers were able to "serve with distinction" after a 12-year stint.

Kassebaum was expected to return to Washington, D.C. late Monday to begin working this week to get support for her proposal to freeze federal spending.

"Many believe it is one of the best proposals around," she said.

Kassebaum's only challenger is Democrat James Maher, an Overland Park investments counselor Maher has criticized her proposed freeze, claiming that projected surpluses in Social Security reserve funds by the turn of the century make a freeze on benefits unnecessary.

But Kassebaum defended her proposal to freeze the budget for one year.

"It's very hard to make a 20-year estimate and make it accurate," Kassebaum said, adding that such Social Security fund projections are usually based on optimistically low inflation and interest rates.

She called her proposal a precautionary measure which would not only protect the Social Security fund but would help avert future increases in withholding taxes to fund it.

Kassebaum, who spent about $850,000 during her 1978 primary and general election campaigns, said she hopes to hold her campaign expenses this year to $400,000 or less.

Salt firm ownership may change

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The American Salt Co., which operates salt mining and processing operations in Lyons and Salt Lake City, may be sold to a Michigan firm for $40 million, company officials announced Monday.

The General Host Corp., of Stamford, Conn., has signed a letter of intent to sell the Kansas City-based subsidiary to the Diamond Crystal Salt Co., of St. Clair, Mich., the company said in a prepared statement.

However, Ron Nugent, president of American Salt, said Diamond Crystal still must fulfill a number of unspecified conditions before actual contract negotiations could begin.

The principal assets of American Salt Co. include a rock salt mine and processing facilities in Lyons, Kan., and a plant near Salt Lake City that uses solar energy as a means of production, the company said.

Harris J. Ashton, chairman and chief executive officer of General Host, said American Salt had been a profitable addition to its parent company.

"Hence, our decision to sell American Salt was made after considerable deliberations," Ashton said. "Nevertheless, based on our long-term strategy, this will allow us to devote a growing share of our resources to our specialty retailing businesses."

American Salt is a defendant in a lawsuit being tried in U.S. District Court in Wichita, in which 27 Lyons-area farmers have sought $2.4 million in damages for alleged groundwater pollution in connection with the salt processing operation.

Nugent denied the sale agreement had any connection to the suit. The General Host statement said the sale price substantially exceeded the subsidiary's book value but "due to a number of contingencies, the after-tax gain cannot now be determined."

Cody, Watkins leave K-State cage program

Two members of K-State's men's basketball squads have quit and will transfer to other schools, Head Coach Jack Hartman announced.

Forward Lafayette Watkins and guard Jonas Cody will not return for the 1984-1985 season.

Watkins, a three-year letterman, started in 11 games for the Wildcats last season and averaged 5.9 points per game. He averaged 4.6 points during his sophomore year and 3.9 in his freshman campaign.

Cody, who averaged 2.9 points for K-State during his sophomore year last season, scored a career-high 20 points against Iowa State University. Cody averaged 3.9 points a game as a freshman.

Cody is expected to transfer to Central Missouri State University, the Division II national champions last season.

"They both feel like they might be able to get more playing time at another school and I wish them well," Hartman said. "They both said they have nothing but the utmost respect for our program, but that they might better utilize their talents at another school. I wish them nothing but success."

Shopping for credit can save money

(Editor's note: This is the first of a series of articles written by members of the K-State Consumer Relations Board to educate readers on topics of consumer interest as part of National Consumer Awareness Week this week.)

By LISA McCRANN
Contributing Writer

Credit is supposed to be a convenience. It allows consumers to enjoy something now on the promise that they'll pay for it in the future. But credit cards may not seem so convenient when bills begin to arrive.

Knowing the difference between credit plans can help consumers organize and maintain a payment schedule, and comparing financial charges, interest rates and annual card fees can save them money.

Charge or pay-as-you-go cards, like American Express, Carte Blanche and Diner's Club, place no limit on the amount the holder may charge, but the bills must be paid in full each month. There is also an annual fee which covers extra services like personal check cashing.

Credit or buy-now-pay-later cards, like VISA or Mastercard, are generally issued by banks and have a credit limit. Each month, the consumer may choose to make a minimum payment and pay off large purchases over time, but interest is assessed on the unpaid balance. Many bank cards have recently begun to charge annual fees and increase their annual percentage interest rates, so these costs should be compared.

Retail cards are issued by department stores and specialty shops. Opening these accounts and paying the bills promptly is a good way to start a credit history.

Retail cards are charge cards, so the consumer has the option of paying the bills in full or extending the payments and paying a finance charge. By using department store cards correctly, the holder can use the stores' money for free. After charging something, the card holder has about a month before he is billed. It is a good idea to save some money each week so the bill can be paid when it arrives. In this way the consumer can enjoy another month's interest on his money and can avoid paying a finance charge.

Oil Company Cards can either be credit or charge cards, so consumers should around and compare.

Bank Debit Cards (24-hour Bank Cards) can be used at automatic teller machines in banks to make deposits, withdraw cash, transfer money from one account to another, make loan payments and balance inquiries.

The 3 1/4 x 2 1/4 inch plastic card that was introduced in 1950 has long since achieved a prominent and permanent place in the American economy. Although the system is neither perfect nor foolproof — and certainly not free — in balance it may offer the most practical way for consumers to handle credit.

Natural gas company to refund $80 million

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission on Monday ordered Northwest Central Pipeline Co. to begin refunding about $80 million to its natural gas customers in Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Nebraska and Texas.

The order followed a petition filed by the Kansas Corporation Commission earlier this month which urged the federal commission to prohibit Northwest Central from postponing the refund for 18 months.

As a result of the ruling, Gas Service Co. of Kansas City, Mo. — Northwest Central's largest wholesale natural gas customer — said it will reduce gas prices immediately to its 400,000 natural gas customers in Kansas by 5 cents per thousand cubic feet.

That decrease represents only a small portion of the total refund, which is estimated to be about $30 for the average residential customer, a Gas Service spokesman said.

About 50,000 customers of Union Gas System of Independence and 25,000 "C" system customers of Kansas Power and Light Co. of Topeka also are served by Northwest Central and will benefit from the refund. The "C" system makes use of out-of-state, instead of Kansas-produced, gas.

FERC told the pipeline company to consider refunding the $80 million over 12 months, instead of the usual six-month refund period.

In its petition, the KCC asked that the refund, $57 million of which results from an overcollection on winter gas bills, be made over 12 months to ensure that those who use the most natural gas in winter receive appropriate refunds.

Using lower gas prices over the next six months to make the refund would benefit industry most because industrial use is steadier throughout the year, the KCC's petition stated.

Unusually cold weather prompted a high demand for natural gas last winter. That high demand allowed Northwest Central to use cheaper natural gas to supplement the expensive gas it already had agreed to buy through so-called take-or-pay contracts.

However, the pipeline company continued to charge its customers the price it had projected for gas before the winter began, making a refund necessary.

Northwest Central had requested permission from FERC to postpone the refund for 18 months, saying it could stabilize wholesale natural gas rates at their current level for 18 months if it could hold onto the $80 million it owes its customers.

The KCC contended Northwest Central was proposing to use for corporate purposes the money it owed to consumers.

Economists predict recovery in Kansas

By The Associated Press

OVERLAND PARK — Kansas will catch up with the national economic recovery this year after a weak performance during 1983, Federal Reserve Bank economists financial leaders said Monday.

The agriculture and energy sectors in the state's economy lagged behind manufacturing and construction last year, Marvin Duncan, a vice president and economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City, said during a forum at an Overland Park hotel.

"In the year ahead, some of these sectors will add greater strength to the state economy," Duncan said. "Agriculture — particularly livestock production — will likely become more profitable."

The presentations were part of a series of forums held each spring and fall throughout seven Midwestern states that comprise the 10th Federal Reserve District, officials said.

Increased strength in aircraft and farm equipment manufacturing was forecast especially in the last half of 1984, said Duncan, adding that energy exploration and development also should pick up this year.

Moreover, a growth in employment and an increase in personal income should support expansion in retail sales, he said.

"The state's rebound from recession began about the same time as the national recovery as a result of strength in automobile manufacturing, construction and improved farm income due to the government's payment-in-kind program," Duncan said.

However, he said growth in employment and personal income in Kansas last year was slower than the national average.

Two other economists — J.A. Cacy and Glenn Miller — addressed the broader picture of the national economy.

Cacy, a Federal Reserve vice president and head of the Kansas City bank's economic research department, said the Fed is committed to a monetary policy of supplying sufficient money and credit to support a growing, but noninflationary economy.

Many of the positive economic developments during 1983 are continuing this year, Cacy said.

Miller, another vice president and economic adviser, focused on dangers to the economy.

"The most obvious potential roadblock to further healthy expansion remains the large federal deficits projected for the 1980s," Miller said. "Action to control those anticipated deficits would greatly improve the chances for an economic expansion of the least typical length."

the law in a federal trial court two years ago.

While the tone of the justices' questions during oral argument sessions does not always reflect a case's eventual outcome, Monday's session was unusually one-sided.

When Keppel argued that "we're cutting these young men off from proceeding" with their college education, Chief Justice Warren E. Burger suggested that the students have it within their own power to avoid losing federal aid by registering for the draft.

Senators allocate sport funds

By STEVE SWAFFORD
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate voted 44-7 Tuesday night to increase its funding for Sports Club Council by $406.50 in 1984-1985.

The council, which represents seven sports clubs, three more than last year, eventually received $3,113 as a tentative allocation.

An amendment by Kelly Miller, freshman in pre-professional business administration, would have eliminated all student funding for the organization. Miller said sports clubs do not benefit anyone at K-State except the individuals involved. The financial responsibility for the groups should be left to individuals participating in each of the sports, he said.

Catherine Saylor, graduate in veterinary medicine, said

Human rights coalition drops allocations request

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

The Coalition for Human Rights withdrew its allocations request for the 1984-1985 academic year following a Student Senate Finance Committee recommendation to end funding.

For the 1983-1984 academic year the coalition was allocated $132.99. This was the amount left from the group's allocation in 1982-1983. The coalition originally submitted a request for funding of $1,025, but the Finance Committee recommended cutting the group's allocation completely.

Kirk Porteous, chairman of the Finance Committee and junior in radio and television, said the coalition's political slant and the service it provides to students were two deciding factors in his group's decision.

"It's been a policy of Student Senate in the past to not fund political groups. The Finance Committee, after a review, decided the Coalition for Human Rights was very political," he said. "There's a fine line between a political group and a non-political group, and we think they have stepped over it."

Porteous cited the coalition's sponsorship of a demonstration

Student Senate refuses to fund 'political' groups

against President Reagan during his 1983 K-State visit and the group's policy of bringing in only speakers opposed to the Reagan administration.

"The group is to the left of the political spectrum, but that doesn't make any difference. The group could be conservatively oriented and we would still have to cut funds," Porteous said.

John Carrasco, Coalition for Human Rights president and senior in political science, said he disagrees with the political characterization his group has received.

"All the accusations made against the organization are without basis," he said. "If they (senate) would even just begin to see the issue — the story is in the faces of the people caught in the middle. These aren't the people toting guns, and they aren't the right or left. These people are the majority but have the smallest voice."

"We are not affiliated with any political organization, domestic or foreign. We don't advocate political action," Carrasco said. "We are not trying to get students involved in the political process. We are mainly trying to provide information through speakers and literature."

Porteous said the coalition's informational function is not vital enough to deserve funding from student funds.

"The coalition provides information as a benefit, but it is questionable whether students want that benefit," he said. "If I want information like they provide, I'll read Newsweek or Time or go out and find it. In a tight year, this is something we just don't need to be funding."

Carrasco said the coalition provides a needed service to K-State students.

"Some senators say we duplicate the services of U-Learn," he said. "I went to U-Learn and asked some questions about Central America. I went on Saturday, and when I got my answer on Tuesday afternoon, I was told they got the answers from the Coalition for Human Rights."

"We are making information available for people interested in these issues. We want to open their eyes wider. We're stimulating questions, and people are coming to their own conclusions," he said.

Carrasco said his group provides equal opportunity for all viewpoints, not only those who are opposed to the policies of the Reagan administration.

"I have been told by some senators that we are one-sided," he said. "I told them what programs we had coming up and asked how we could present these things without being one-sided, and they saw no alternative. We can't tell the speakers only to talk about certain things."

"Both sides are there in coalition presentations. We're providing a forum for people to come and discuss these issues with an expert."

Carrasco said he disagrees with the way the Student Senate has dealt with his organization.

"The message I get is that Student Senate and ASK are the only political games in town. I can tell by the trends they set and funding they receive that they intend to keep it that way," he said. "I'm making an effort to understand what's going on."

We're all students on this campus — you'd think we'd have better things to do than fight over what is political and educational.

"No matter what you do, you're always going to be political," he said. "We're withdrawing our request for funding because things can't be resolved as they stand now. We are still going to try for funding, but just change our strategy."

The organization is measuring its worth by trying to get more people involved in its activities, Carrasco said. Also, the group is distributing a petition urging senators to support allocations for the organization.

"If students aren't interested, it is for them to tell us, not a few select individuals (Finance Committee)," Carrasco said.

Porteous said he hopes the coalition's actions don't overturn the Finance Committee's recommendation.

"I know that they are giving a sincere effort to lobby the senate," he said. "I just hope they aren't successful because it would set a dangerous precedent. If we give funding to a group like this, then there's no way we can turn down requests from any other political group on campus. We just don't have that kind of money."

California trembles in wake of quake

By The Associated Press

MORGAN HILL, Calif. — A powerful earthquake jarred a wide area of Northern California on Tuesday, triggering a $1 million fire, knocking houses from their foundations and shaking San Francisco skyscrapers. At least 21 people suffered minor injuries.

The University of California seismographic station in Berkeley said the earthquake struck at 1:16 p.m. PST and registered 6.2 on the Richter scale. It was centered on the Calaveras Fault 12 miles east of San Jose and 50 miles south of San Francisco.

The quake was felt for hundreds of miles, even into western Nevada, but most of the damage appeared minor and centered in Morgan Hill, about 10 miles south of San Jose. By contrast, the 6.7 earthquake that hit Coalinga in Central California on May 2, 1983 leveled the downtown area, causing $31 million in damage and injuring 47 people.

Officials said the injured, including three from an elementary school, were taken to Wheeler Hospital in Gilroy, about 65 miles south of San Francisco.

At least six aftershocks were reported between 1:30 and 2:21 p.m., ranging from 3.0 to 3.8 on the Richter scale, according to Robert Uhrhammer, research seismologist at UC-Berkeley.

A broken fuel line at the Blossom Hill Auto Repair Shop in San Jose triggered a fire that caused $1 million in damage to the shop and two others, fire officials said. There were no injuries.

It was the strongest earthquake on the Calaveras since 1911, according to Bill Ellsworth, chief of the seismology branch of the United States Geological Survey in nearby Menlo Park.

Greg Carrascho, a desk clerk at the 10-story Red Lion Inn in San Jose, said, "The hotel just swayed and swayed. Water was coming out of the pools in big waves. I guess a lot of people, mostly out-of-towners, had never felt an earthquake before."

San Jose Fire Department Battalion Chief Ron Delgado ordered City Hall evacuated when he was informed of structural damage there. A dozen people were trapped briefly in elevators which shut off automatically, but the elevators were lowered manually and the people inside were freed uninjured.

The Bay Area Rapid Transit system, a sleek commuter train service serving San Francisco, Alameda and Contra Costa counties, shut down for about eight minutes, then ran trains at half speed for another eight minutes while operators checked the tracks for damage.

The Golden Gate Bridge and the San Francisco-Oakland Bay Bridge both remained open.

The quake cracked the pavement atop Anderson Dam five miles east of San Jose, the state Department of Water Resources said. Ground crews were sent to inspect the dam and the upstream gates were closed.

The department reported that it halted the pumping of water through the California Aqueduct south of Los Banos until damage to a 500-kilovolt powerplant near that community could be repaired.

Mark Padavan, an inspector with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, said the quake was not felt at the Diablo Canyon nuclear power plant near San Luis Obispo, about 250 miles south of San Francisco.

The quake was felt in Inyo, Sacramento, Mono, Sonoma and Stanislaus counties, among others.

Richard P. Coleman, professor of marketing, stands amid a collection of maps which line the walls of his home. Coleman, who said he enjoys working with young people, also makes a hobby of studying the elite, including making color-coded maps of the areas in which people live.

Professor maps elites' distribution as hobby

By CARA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Distraction is not a problem in his office. It is something of a shoe box inside, long and narrow, with nearly empty, white walls.

He sat in there, wearing a white, starched shirt and a natty, maroon and yellow striped navy tie. To look at him, one might think he was a conservative, calm, soft-spoken man.

"When I say 'I hate plants and animals,' I really do mean I hate them. I know no one is supposed to be like that today," he said, laughing in a raspy voice.

"One time someone gave me a plant and I looked at it and said, 'Die, plant.' I want to nurture young minds, not dogs and petunias."

Richard P. Coleman, professor of marketing, leaned back in his chair and twirled his glasses in his hand. He propped his feet on his desk with all the confidence of a company president. His intellectual presence was broken only by his distinctive laugh and his sly-as-an-alley-cat smile.

His smile slid across his face at the beginning of each laugh, punctuating it with meaning. Each seemed to be a devious companion of the other.

"I want to say 'Hey, look at yourselves, kids, don't pretend you're as rational as the models of economic man you study.' I want them (students) to understand that all men are full of folly and foibles," he said.

For class, Coleman comes prepared.

"I try to have every word written out in advance. I don't trust myself to be so silver-tongued," he said. "I try to always have one or two anecdotes that aren't written out to make my lectures more entertaining. At points in the lecture if I see the students dozing off I say (to myself), 'Coleman, buddy boy, you better change this next time.' Of course if it even bores me, I know I need to change it," he said.

Coleman, who received his master's degree in educational psychology from the University of Iowa and his doctorate in human development from the University of Chicago, did not enter the teaching profession until 1981 when he arrived at K-State. Before that, he pursued his lifelong love of studying society while doing motivation research at Social Research

Inc. in Chicago from 1957 to 1969.

From 1969 to 1980, Coleman was associated with the Joint Center for Urban Studies of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) and Harvard University. Through most of those years he was working on two major projects.

One was a study of what Americans want in their housing and neighborhoods, and the other was an update of his social class studies. For his final two years with the center he returned to Kansas City and completed his social history of that city's elite. All this research was financed by grants from foundations and the federal government.

Vermont Democrats favor Hart as nominee

By The Associated Press

The Rev. Jesse Jackson joined Gary Hart on Tuesday in condemning Walter F. Mondale's use of independent delegate committees to boost his presidential bid, and the Colorado senator won Vermont's local Democratic caucuses over his two rivals.

Mondale, meanwhile, launched a barrage against what he termed President Reagan's plan to "open the heavens for warfare."

Hart's victory in Vermont's first-round delegate selection contest was by a smaller margin than the one he ran up in the state's non-binding primary seven weeks ago.

Mondale, who failed to win a single community as Hart swept to a 71 percent majority in the primary, ran a strong second in the caucuses held to decide 13 national convention delegates.

With 70 percent of the caucuses reporting, Hart had 51 percent of the local delegates selected to 32 percent for Mondale and 12 percent for Jackson. Vermont Democrats were picking about 1,550 state convention delegates, and the 13 national delegates are to be determined on the basis of that voting.

While campaigning, Mondale called for a temporary moratorium on anti-satellite weapons, negotiations for a verifiable ban on them, reaffirmation of the anti-ballistic missile treaty and a temporary moratorium on testing and deploying all weapons in space until agreement on a permanent treaty to ban them.

In recent days, Mondale has been under attack, predominantly by Hart, because independent delegate committees supporting his candidacy have been accepting money from political action committees representing special interest groups.

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration said Tuesday that Soviet forces have opened a major offensive against rebels in Afghanistan and a Pentagon spokesman said "it appears their force levels of personnel, aircraft and armor may be higher than ever before."

Defense Department spokesman Michael Burch also said the Soviets "probably have begun to employ high-altitude bombing" for the first time in their four-year effort to suppress Afghan resistance, which began with a Soviet invasion in late 1979.

"It appears that some sort of spring offensive has begun," Burch said in response to questions.

At the State Department, spokesman Alan Romberg said the United States has confirmed from several sources that the new Soviet military offensive includes "high-altitude saturation bombing" up and down the 70-mile-long Panjsher Valley north of Kabul, the Afghan capital. The rebels have a stronghold in the valley.

Romberg said the bombing began on Friday and continued Saturday.

"There is also a large convoy of several hundred Soviet vehicles which has started to move north from the mouth of the valley," Romberg said.

In addition, he said other Soviet "sweep operations" are taking place in western Afghanistan near Herat and near Jalalabad, the country's second and third largest cities after Kabul.

Other such operations are taking place in northern Afghanistan, close to the Soviet border, Romberg said.

He reported increased resistance activity near Kabul, saying Mujahidin resistance fighters have carried out numerous raids and attacks on the main road from the Soviet Union to Kabul.

Burch was vague on the numbers of Soviet troops, planes, tanks and armored troop carriers being used against an Afghan rebel stronghold in the Panjsher Valley.

Burch did not specifically identify the types of bombers being used by the Soviets against targets in the valley, but he told reporters that "I wouldn't quarrel" with reports that the Soviets have sent TU-16 Badger bombers against the Afghans from bases in the southern part of the Soviet Union.

Ray Coleman, professor of marketing and director of the International Trade Institute, has announced the key speakers for K-State's 10th International Trade Conference on Thursday and Friday.

This year's conference, which will be held in Doubletree Hotel in Overland Park, is a Finance Symposium on International Dimensions of Capital Markets.

Among speakers will be Ian Giddy of the Columbia Graduate School of Business; Richard K. Goeltz, vice president and treasurer at Joseph E. Seagram & Sons Inc.; and John Beattie, an international tax specialist and partner with Deloitte, Haskins, and Sells.

The dinner speaker Thursday night will be Edward Schuh, head of the Department of Agricultural and Applied Economics at the University of Minnesota.

Joly Dixon, first secretary for Economic and Monetary Affairs to the Delegation of the Commission of the European Communities to the U.S., will address the luncheon Friday.

The symposium concludes Friday afternoon with a discussion of "Trade Finance Interrelationships: Roles, Expectations, Problems and Successes," as viewed by the local bank, multi-national bank and the manufacturer.

Professor receives faculty award

William Fateley, professor of chemistry, has been chosen to receive K-State's Distinguished Graduate Faculty Award for 1984.

The honor, which carries with it a $1,000 honorarium provided through the KSU Foundation, will be recognized at the Graduate Commencement Exercises on May 11.

Fateley, who has an international reputation in infrared and Raman Spectroscopy, was the first to use diffuse reflectance infrared spectrometry to understand the theoretical basis behind the measured spectra.

Fateley earned his doctorate degree at K-State in 1955 and did graduate or post-graduate work at Northwestern University, Indiana University, the University of Maryland and the University of Minnesota.

He joined Carnegie-Mellon Institute in 1963 and served as assistant to the president and as a professor of chemistry before being named head of the K-State Department of Chemistry in 1972. He left administration for full-time teaching, research and writing in 1979.

The K-State Graduate Faculty Award annually recognizes an individual who through sustained, major scholarly research or creative contributions is judged by peers to be an authority in that field.

Fateley was chosen for the honor by a Graduate Faculty Committee composed of one representative from each of the University's eight colleges.

Volunteers are needed in many agencies throughout the campus and Manhattan communities. In fact, May 6-12 is National Volunteer Week. An excellent place to find out what agencies need volunteers is the Volunteer Clearing House. The purpose of the VCH is to provide a centralized location to register volunteer needs, recruit volunteers and match those wishing to volunteer with requesting agencies. The VCH, which is a service of the United Way of Riley County, is

According to Tuttle Creek State Park office, a permit must be purchased to recreate in the River Pond Area. An individual may purchase an annual permit for $15, which is good through Dec. 31, or buy a daily permit for $2. Any car parked in the state park must have a permit or may be fined.

As for any party plans you might have, the state park does not reserve responsible drinking.

Kirk Porteous, Finance Committee chairman and senior in radio and television, said BACCHUS was denied its request because the group failed to provide Finance Committee with proper information for their request.

John Carrasco, president of the Coalition for Human Rights and senior in political science, said the coalition is withdrawing its request for funding, but claimed the group will continue to be recognized on campus. He said the coalition would use every legislative, judicial and political avenue available until it receives funding.

Senate had refused to fund any of the coalition's $1,025 request for 1984-1985. The group was allocated $132.99 in 1983-1984 for advertising and printing costs and wanted additional money for postage, a telephone, rent of equipment, rent of space, supplies, advertising and printing.

Tentative allocations will continue at 6 p.m. Thursday in the Union Big Eight Room.

The Corps of Engineers is responsible for the area before the "tubes," and they reserve spaces for parties. Their telephone number is 539-8511.

How will we receive our grades for spring semester classes?

According to the Registrar's Office, grades will be mailed directly to the student's permanent address. Exactly when students will receive their grades is uncertain because the time it takes to process everyone's grades cannot be predetermined.

It is advised that students make sure they have the correct permanent address listed with the registrar so they can be assured of receiving their grades. If a student does need to update his address, a form must be filled out in Anderson 118.

School marks civil rights turning point

(Editor's note: This is the seventh of eight articles about little-known historical sites in Kansas. "Hidden Places" is a program of University for Man and K-State's Division of Continuing Education.)

By ADAM ROME
Contributing Writer

It is a pretty school, one of the prettiest in Topeka.

The brick is a radiant red and orange, and the facade is rich in detail — at one end is a large frieze of the sun beaming down on children running, skipping, jumping rope, rolling a hoop, flying a kite; at the other end is a sculpture of a woman holding in her hands an open book; in the center is a simple tower, topped by a weather vane; and in between are small tablets of sun-lit landscapes and billowy clouds.

It is indeed a temple of learning, a monument to the peculiarly American faith in the blessings of education.

Yet the Sumner School also is a poignant place, a reminder of one of the great events in modern American history.

One September morning in 1950, Oliver Brown walked to the Sumner School with his daughter Linda to enroll her in the third grade. He was turned away, for, in keeping with state law, the elementary schools of Topeka were segregated. The Sumner School was for whites and the Browns were black.

"I remember (my father) talking with the principal," Linda later explained, "and I remember our brisk walk back home and I could just feel the tension within him, and I knew there was something terribly wrong about this."

The segregation in the schools was of course just part of a larger segregation in society. The hotels of Topeka were segregated, as were the restaurants, movie theaters and swimming pools.

The working world, too, was segregated. There were 214 white typesetters in Topeka in 1950, and 2 blacks; 215 white electricians, and 1 black; 425 white accountants, and 1 black.

As attorney Charles Scott recalled, "You'd look up and down Kansas Avenue early in the morning, and all you could see were blacks washing windows. That wasn't anything, but at least it was work. There was still no chance for a black man to become a bank teller or a store clerk or a brick mason. The few blacks with union jobs at Goodyear almost never advanced, and people were retiring from the Santa Fe shops after holding the same job for 20 or 25 years."

Yet a few in the black community were no longer willing to accept such second-class citizenship.

At the urging of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Brown and the parents of 19 other black children brought suit against the Topeka Board of Education, a suit that challenged both the practice and the principle of segregation.

"I and my children are craving light," one of the plaintiffs testified before the Shawnee County District Court; "the entire colored race is craving light, and the only way to reach the light is to start our children together in their infancy, and they come up together."

The plaintiffs lost at first, and the Topeka suit was then heard on appeal by the Supreme Court, in conjunction with suits from South Carolina, Virginia, Delaware and the District of Columbia.

On May 17, 1954, Chief Justice Earl Warren read the court's unanimous opinion in Brown vs. Board of Education. The court concluded that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal," and the laws permitting or requiring segregation in public schools were judged unconstitutional.

A jubilant NAACP attorney predicted that day that segregation in the schools would be ended in less than five years, and segregation of all forms by the 100th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. And the effect of the decision was indeed revolutionary.

Soon black men and women were demanding coffee at segregated lunch counters, refusing to stand at the back of segregated buses, standing in long and uncomfortable lines to register to vote. The Supreme Court judged segregation unconstitutional in waiting rooms and restaurants, in public transportation and public housing and public facilities. The Congress passed important civil rights legislation in 1957, 1960, 1964 and 1965.

"We thought perhaps that this was the answer to all our woes and evils," Scott said with a smile, "but we find out differently today." Prejudice persists.

Yet, as the Washington Post reported in 1974, "a whole generation has been born, grown up, and gone to college without having seen a restroom door marked 'white' and 'colored.'" At the Sumner School, white and black and hispanic children now study together.

Regents approve funding, renovation of Van Zile Hall

The Kansas Board of Regents on Friday approved the funding and plans for the renovation of Van Zile Hall.

Total cost of the renovation is projected at $1.01 million, said Stanley Koplik, executive director of the regents.

Koplik said there were no problems in approving the funding, which he said should cover all costs involved in the renovation process.

"That figure equals around $16 per square foot, and I think that's very good," he said.

The renovation of the hall has been in developmental stages for about the last two years, said Thomas Frith, director of housing.

Actual construction cost for renovation is approximately $800,000, but the total package includes architectural and other fees, which raise the cost to the $1 million mark, Frith said.

Frith said specifications for renovation were sent to the state architect, who then presented them to the regents for approval. Approval of the specifications, funding and architect's drawings now allow contractors to prepare bids for the renovation work, he said.

The work expected to be completed through the renovation includes replacing the hall's mechanical system, generators and wiring. The hall will meet fire codes by adding a sprinkler system in the basement and enclosing stairwells. Electric heat and air conditioning systems also will be added.

In addition, eight rooms will be added to the first floor and the floor will be made accessible to the handicapped.

A pre-bid conference is set for May 17 at Van Zile to allow contractors to inspect the hall and determine the type of construction and renovation work required. Contractors may submit bids until May 31.

The contracts for the renovation work will go to the company with the "low bid that meets all of our specifications," Frith said.

Renovation is scheduled to begin in the middle of June if no problems arise, Frith said.

And so now the Great Rondini is about to reappear in China. By the time he returns, Congress will have forgotten it is angry with him over Central America. But even if it still is, the Great Rondini will distract it. Maybe he'll declare war on terrorism.

Similarly, the administration of the Great Rondini has again declared war against state sponsored terrorism. This news was greeted with great excitement a couple of weeks ago by some newspaper editors who placed the story on the front page. The Great Rondini made them forget. A war against terrorism was declared when the administration first took office and, in fact, it was made the No. 1 priority.

The second trick of the Great Rondini is his ability to make everyone forget. It is often said the Great Ron-our awareness of other cultures or to teach us something about the truly rotten state of affairs in places about which we would prefer to remain more comfortably ignorant — the Middle East, Central America and South Africa.

I am referring in general to senate's treatment of the International Coordinating Council and the Coalition for Human Rights, shabby in both cases. I am concerned more particularly about the second organization, which I happen to support.

Several recent Collegian articles and editorials question the equitableness, if not the ethics, of senate's rationale for allocations and their denial to fund the coalition is a case in point. Citing a single 1982 incident in which the coalition placed an ad in the Collegian urging sup-

Second, whether the policy was selectively applied isn't the primary issue. Obviously the regulation applies to all equally (except for handicapped parking stalls). If there was selective towing by campus police, drivers should document and present the case to the traffic council.

Which brings up the third point. It is my understanding that the traffic council was established to address such matters and represent the stu-

Furthermore, will laws be broken with this no-tow policy? Will any city or state laws be violated in regard to the fire lanes? Will the possible lack of assured available parking for the handicapped violate federal laws?

Finally, how can these regulations be effectively executed when University politics override the original intent to which the regulations were written?

As a commuting student, I understand the problem of limited parking. K-State's rights are not violated by towing away illegally parked vehicles. Allowing these infractions to occur unanswered only adds ambiguity to the problem. Perhaps it is time the campus police and the Traffic and Parking Council got together and decided who's the chief instead of waiting for students, visitors or board members to get caught in the middle.

Robert Belongi
senior in mechanical engineering

The words "reserved stall" conjure an image of something I cannot afford — a guaranteed spot to park my car on this campus. I have noticed the words "reserved stall" and "tow zone" can usually be found together, on the same sign. Hence, I don't park in reserved stalls during the times posted on the signs.

"Handicapped parking" doesn't refer to those who cannot parallel park. No, this term is one I deeply respect. A stall marked "handicapped parking" means someone who has some sort of physical disability — be it permanent or temporary — can come on this great campus and park close to a building or area so they don't have to lose an educational opportunity.

The handicapped parking signs usually carry the phrases "reserved stall" and "tow zone," which should be clues as to what happens to people who have no business park in a handicapped stall. I don't park in these stalls. Ever. I am able to walk to my destination from a "faraway" parking spot.

I think people who wrongly take a handicapped parking stall should be sentenced to rolling themselves around this campus in a wheelchair twice a day, for one week. If this seems too stiff a sentence, then the violators can walk the campus, using crutches, for the same amount of time. Take your pick.

So much for the "But, I was in a hurry and I only took two minutes" defense.

Parking in a fire zone is also a no-no. I'm sometimes pretty stupid, but I can't afford a ticket for this violation. Besides, if a fire broke out, my car could keep life- and property-saving equipment from being properly used and available. I don't want that rap following me around for the rest of my life.

I thought we had some fair rules regarding this policy.

Now, I discover I can park my car in a reserved stall, tow zone, handicapped stall or a fire zone and have it be safe from the dreaded tow truck. Gene Cross, vice president for University Facilities, said vehicles will be towed only on "an emergency basis." Cross said he, K-State Police Department Director Art Stone or an "acting chief" (in case Cross and Stone aren't available) will determine what is — or isn't — an emergency.

I'm confused. I thought the Board of Regents approved the parking and traffic rules which govern K-State. I also thought these rules were made by the Traffic and Parking Council, a group of students faculty and staff which probably will take the heat for this latest turn of events, despite its attempt to show its displeasure over the new towing rule.

I knew Cross could overrule the council; I didn't know he could overrule the regents.

There are some things which worry me about Cross' new rule. What is an emergency? We haven't been given any guidelines on this. Since those of us who pay for parking permits (and tickets) pay the people who enforce the rules, we deserve to know what constitutes an emergency. Shutting the barn door after the horses have escaped is an ineffective policy.

I hope no one decides to completely disobey all parking rules. Those who have a reserved stall cannot park elsewhere. They have paid for the right to park in one stall; they shouldn't be denied that right just because "it isn't an emergency, so I won't get towed."

The same can be said for handicapped spaces. Leave them for those who need them.

Let the fire lanes stay clear, for obvious reasons.

I don't care if "possible" new students, rich alumni or visitors complain about their cars being towed because they were in a reserved stall, tow zone, handicapped stall or fire lane. If these people can't read, then they shouldn't be on this campus — or on our state's highways.

If bending rules just to preserve our campus's image is going to continue, then this University eventually will cease to exist. Rules should be changed by proper procedure by an informed public which is able to make suggestions and comments about proposed rules which will govern it.

Kansas Legislature to reconvene today

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Legislature returns to Topeka today to finish work left undone when it recessed April 5, but with the outlook still gloomy for solving such sensitive issues as property classification, legalizing pari-mutuel wagering and increasing the drinking age for 3.2 beer.

The lawmakers will approve an omnibus appropriations bill to provide financing for agencies and programs not funded in measures already signed into law by Gov. John Carlin, and will pass a pay bill to provide salary increases for state employees come July 1.

They also are expected to take additional action to alleviate the state's acute prison overcrowding problem and on Carlin's hazardous waste cleanup legislation — although probably not approving everything the governor is seeking in those two areas.

Carlin has listed addressing prison overcrowding, a property classification amendment and hazardous waste as the three priority issues he wants resolved by lawmakers in the wrapup session.

Before the Legislature reconvenes in mid-morning today, a legislative hearing room will echo once more with arguments over whether to increase the legal age for drinking 3.2 percent beer in Kansas from 18 to 19 — and whether to attach to the bill any amendments liberalizing the state's liquor laws.

The Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee begins a hearing at 8 a.m. on the bill to raise the drinking age, with some senators wanting to attach to it such things as legalizing Sunday beer sales, allowing private drinking clubs on private passenger trains and allowing motels in small towns to have contracts with local private clubs so their guests can go there for a drink.

The senators who want the added provisions see the push for increasing the drinking age as a golden opportunity to win some other long-sought liberalizations in state liquor laws.

But Speaker Mike Hayden flatly predicted the House would accept nothing beyond a "clean" bill which simply raises the 3.2 beer drinking age to 19.

"Those Christmas tree amendments won't go in the House," he said. "The votes are not there. If they get even one of those amendments on it, it won't pass. I feel personally we should raise the drinking age, and this is the year, but only to 19 and that alone."

A proposed constitutional amendment to classify property and tax the classes at different rates has advanced farther this session than at any time in state history, with the House giving one resolution the required two-thirds approval on March 21. However, there still is no consensus proposal with widespread support in both houses.

The Senate tax committee overhauled the House version to the point nobody believes it can win the required two-thirds endorsement in the upper legislative chamber without further amendment, and both Hayden and Senate Majority Leader Bob Talkington conceded the prospects for passing a classification resolution are dim at best.

"I'm certainly not going to let it block adjournment," Hayden said in an interview Tuesday. "As far as the House is concerned, it's up to the Senate to pass something now. But we're still lacking a classification system that a consensus can be built around."

"It's still a grab bag with everyone trying to get what they can."

Similarly, Hayden said a resolution to submit to voters in November a proposed amendment to legalize pari-mutuel betting on races doesn't appear to have enough support to justify spending time debating it in the wrapup session.

"I see no need to debate it if it doesn't have the votes," the speaker said. "If I thought it was going to pass or the vote would be close, we'd take it up. But at this point that doesn't appear likely. We're going to poll our people again, but the last time we did, it was a good dozen or more votes short (of the two-thirds majority needed)."

"If that doesn't change, there's no need to take it up."

A committee report recommending the pari-mutuel wagering resolution will be read into the House record today, putting the measure on the debate calendar Thursday. But Hayden won't let it be debated unless it has a chance at garnering 84 of the 125 House votes.

Five committees have been working since Monday on the final appropriations bill, the hazardous waste package, the prison expansion legislation, the state pay plan and legislation overhauling the process for appealing decisions of state administrative agencies. They will forward their recommendations to the House and Senate today.

Both houses reconvene at 10 a.m.

today, and will plunge into consideration of conference committee reports, motions to concur in amendments made by the opposite house on bills they originated and laboriously moving through debate calendars which still contain 80 bills and resolutions.

Most of those pieces of legislation never will be debated, and they will die when the Legislature reaches final adjournment June 1.

The House will debate a bill to establish an office of emergency medical services within the Kansas Highway Patrol, while the major items on the Senate's debate calendar this morning would revise the distribution of the fire insurance premium tax revenue under the Firefighters' Relief Act and require new teachers to pass a test before they are certified to teach in Kansas.

The so-called cleanup session beginning today is scheduled by resolution to run four days, through Saturday. However, the leadership wants to shut things down Friday night if possible. The lawmakers then will adjourn for all practical purposes, although ceremonial sine die adjournment will not come for another month.

The Legislature also will consider gubernatorial vetoes.

Only two of Carlin's vetoes affect high-visibility legislation during the 1984 session — one of a bill which attempted to ease the impact of the Revenue Department's use of trending factors in assessing business machinery for tax purposes, and one to update the state's decade-old no-fault automobile insurance law.

However, neither veto is expected to be overridden — an action which requires two-thirds approval.

Golf course officials request city funding

Manhattan city commissioners heard from Stag Hill Golf Course officials Tuesday afternoon at a work session about receiving $150,000 to improve conditions of the course.

Larry Becraft, 3205 Highland Court, made several proposals to commissioners which he said would improve not only the aesthetics, but the use of the course.

Becraft said the $150,000 would go toward improving the fairways and building a new clubhouse. An alternative would be for the city to own the clubhouse and lease it to Stag Hill.

Becraft also requested that commissioners consider giving Stag Hill excess dirt and rock from the downtown area when redevelopment begins to build up the river bank, which is spreading into the ninth hole.

In addition to the lump sum of $150,000, Becraft requested that commissioners consider giving Stag Hill annual assistance of $20,000 to $30,000.

Commissioner Rick Mann asked why prices were higher than those of the Rolling Meadows Golf Course in Junction City. Becraft said the Junction City course was built from government funds and the city provides financial assistance.

"That course is a tough course to compete with," Becraft said,

"I've had a lot of people tell me we've got a good course. We're improving, but the weather has been a problem."

Mann also asked why $70,000 is needed for a new clubhouse since people use the facility mainly to play golf. Becraft said the current facility is more than 100 years old and an architect has advised officials to build a new facility.

Commissioner Eugene Klingler agreed.

"They're not talking about something real plush," Klingler said. "They've gotten about the third or fourth mile on that clubhouse. You kind of want to sit by the door if a spark flies."

Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood questioned the urgency of the project. Becraft said, "We're not in any way begging for money."

Commissioners also heard from the Manhattan Public Library Board of Trustees about the possibility of having Sunday hours.

Mildred Loeffler, vice president of the trustees, said the board is worried that lack of funds might not permit the continuance of Sunday hours past 1985.

City Manager Don Harmon proposed raising the current library tax levy of five mills to six mills to guarantee funding for Sunday hours.

Labor leaders oppose wage givebacks

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Leaders of unions representing postal workers and coal miners said Tuesday they will fight any push for wage givebacks as two of this year's major collective bargaining sessions get under way.

The talks seem certain to continue a recent trend of heightened union militancy at the bargaining table following a post-recession period of unprecedented concessions by labor in many industries.

"There will be no givebacks," Moe Biller, president of the American Postal Workers Union and Vincent Sombrotto, head of the National Association of Letter Carriers, declared in a joint statement at the outset of talks with the U.S. Postal Service.

The two union leaders, whose organizations represent more than 500,000 of the 600,000 Postal Service employees, said they viewed the talks with "guarded optimism" that an accord can be reached by the time the current three-year pact expires at 12:01 a.m. on July 21.

Biller and Sombrotto said they were upset by a policy statement approved recently by the board of governors of the Postal Service.

"As a general proposition, the compensation and benefits paid Postal Service employees exceed the compensation and benefits paid for comparable levels of work in the private sector," it said. "The board directs Postal management to seek correction of this situation."

In another part of the city, the United Mine Workers of America, a troubled union with 50,000 people or nearly a third of its membership laid off, opened bargaining with representatives of the soft coal industry on a new contract to replace one which expires Sept. 30.

UMW President Richard Trumka stressed that his union "will not accept any backward steps. No rational arguments have been put forth that justify concessionary demands upon the union."

Bobby R. Brown, chief bargainer for the industry group, the Bituminous Coal Operators Association, cited problems in an industry where demand for coal has slackened and unionized companies face heightened competition from non-union rivals.

Saying that only about 40 percent of national coal tonnage is produced by unionized companies, Brown said "if there is a lesson to be learned from recent experience in our industry, it is that we cannot underwrite extravagant demands simply to buy labor peace."

The 160,000-member UMW won pay raises and other economic benefits amounting to about 37.5 percent over the three years of the current pact — but only after the union struck the industry for 72 days in 1981.

Man sentenced for killing wife

WINFIELD — A 35-year-old Ponca City, Okla., man has been sentenced to 15 years to life in prison for his second-degree murder conviction stemming from the shooting death of his wife last summer.

Cowley County District Court Judge Robert L. Bishop handed down the sentence to Harley Anderson on Monday for the Aug. 5, 1983, killing of his 31-year-old wife, Rita, in a church parking lot south of Arkansas City.

In addition, Anderson was given consecutive prison terms of three to 10 years for two unrelated sex offenses. County Attorney Doug Wright said Anderson would be required to serve a minimum of 21 years in prison.

Kansas law relating to the criminal use of firearms applied to the sentences, which means Anderson would be required to serve the minimum term of each sentence without parole, Wright said.

Anderson originally was charged with first-degree murder in the case in addition to the two sex offenses, Wright said. However, in a plea bargain earlier this month, Anderson pleaded guilty to second-degree murder in addition to the sex charges, the county attorney said.

The Andersons, previously of Arkansas City, had driven from Ponca City early on Aug. 5 for marital counseling from a minister at the church, Wright said. The minister told authorities he had heard three gunshots after the couple drove into the church parking lot.

Pentagon denies magazine report

WASHINGTON — The Defense Department said Tuesday that China has not asked the Reagan administration to sell it sophisticated airborne warning and control planes, nor is the United States considering such a sale.

Pentagon spokesman Michael Burch replied "no" when asked about a published report that the Chinese had requested AWACS planes. He also replied "no" when asked whether the administration is considering such a sale.

The report appeared in the latest issue of Aviation Week and Space Technology, a magazine specializing in aerospace matters.

Son writes story of Nazi father

MUNICH, West Germany — The son of Nazi official Rudolf Hess has written a book detailing his father's 1941 plane flight to England and his imprisonment in West Berlin for war crimes.

Wolf Ruediger Hess will present the 448-page book, "My Father, Rudolf Hess," at a news conference in Munich on Thursday after he returns from a visit to Spandau Prison to celebrate his father's 90th birthday, the book's publishers said Tuesday.

Hess, who was Adolf Hitler's deputy until his mysterious "peace flight" to England, is serving a life sentence imposed by the Nuremberg war crimes tribunal. He is the last major Nazi figure still behind bars.

The book — which includes 149 black-and-white photographs — will go on sale May 2, the Langen Mueller-Herbig publishing house said.

Wolf Hess, who owns a Munich construction company, has tried for years to have his father paroled from Spandau, where he has been the only inmate since 1966.

While the Western allies have said they favor releasing Hess, the Soviet Union has insisted he serve out his sentence.

Coleman

grants are necessary to keep going, and it (a grant) can be revoked at any time," Coleman said.

This precarious source of funds is what he calls "soft" money.

"You can't live the last 15 years of your (working) life on 'soft' money. You want 'hard' money (a constant salary), and tenure," he said.

And so he took the teaching position at K-State.

"I wasn't even sure I would like teaching. But I have greatly enjoyed relating to the students as human beings. I had no idea I would be more than barely adequate as a teacher," Coleman said. "I would hope by now I can say I am more than that."

As a teacher, Coleman has goals for himself. But when he discusses the basic requirements he looks for in a school at which he may someday teach, he soberly removes his feet from his desk and, placing his hands together to form a triangle, taps his fingers to stress his point.

"I wouldn't be interested in teaching in anything but a school of 15,000 to 20,000 (students). I want it to be an important university, playing in a big-league football schedule," he said. "I've been following football since I was six years old. I could read 'Dartmouth' before I could read 'dog.'"

Not only did Coleman spend his childhood rooting for his favorite gridders, a fascination with the elite social class led him to begin his first social research as a child and to his current hobby.

"Since I was knee-high to a grasshopper I was fascinated with the elite. I used to ride around Tulsa on my bike looking at the nearby houses. I started then to do a study of the elite, within easy bike-riding distance," he said.

"I always wanted to be more popular than I was. (Perhaps I thought) by studying it (elite society) I could learn to be more like my uppers," he said.

Combining his childhood curiosity of the elite with his adult education, Coleman developed a hobby of color-coding maps of cities, block-by-block, to show their social status system. To do this, he uses housing values provided by the U.S. census.

Most of these maps are framed and hang on the walls of his home.

Glowing with the purple of the aristocratic, the blue of the upper middle-class, the yellow of the working class, and so on, Coleman's maps, until closely inspected, appear to be pieces of modern art.

Coleman's home, a gallery of sorts, holds more than his collection of maps. A guided tour is necessary to fully understand all the points of interest.

His kitchen, correctly named if one uses the term loosely, has cupboards bulging with manuscripts, most of which deal with his research of cities.

Where does he put his food? Not to worry, he rarely buys much, and that fits nicely into his refrigerator.

"I go out to eat almost all the time," he said. "Mainly because I can't stand (A) to shop for food, (B) to prepare it, (C) to eat the crap I've prepared, or (D) to clean it up."

"Compared with that (preparing food), it (eating out) is wonderful. You eat good food and have waitresses dance attention at you," he said.

"But it's a lot more expensive. It's probably why I can't afford a new Camaro like some of my students seem to think I should," he laughed raspingly.

As he spoke, two of his students rang the front door bell.

"Come on in!" he yelled.

The still unseen visitors came in and shut the door.

"Make yourselves at home. Do you want a beer?" Coleman bellowed from upstairs.

A vague affirmation was heard. "You know where it is, help yourself," he said. Without pausing, he continued the tour.

"And here is the living room," Coleman said, as he descended the stairs and rounded the corner.

The main, and most obvious, attraction is a large painting of a geometric design. Coleman explained that it looks much like a work of the modern artist, Mondrian.

"I've always wanted a Mondrian. But I knew I could never afford Mondrian, so I designed it (the painting) and told my (former college) roommate (who was a student of art) what colors to paint it," he said.

"Anybody who didn't know better might assume it's a Mondrian."

Just in case his artistic taste is questioned, Coleman added some clarifications as he strolled away from the painting.

"Well, he (roommate) didn't paint the exact colors I told him to."

The most notable rooms in Coleman's house are his red den and his black den that are tucked upstairs.

The red den is where Coleman works on his current projects. He calls it his red den because of two red, oriental rugs, one rosewood colored desk, and a red brick fireplace.

"This den is redder than any of the other dens I've had before. It is three times more red, because it has a red brick fireplace. The theory before was that the desk and carpets made it red," he said.

The black den earns its name because of the black desk that holds the center of attention. He bought the desk when he moved from an old apartment, after the apartment owners decided to make it an unfurnished apartment.

"I bought the desk because my cards fit perfectly in the drawers," he said.

The cards are used in Coleman's study of Kansas City and contain information on the biographical data of about 25,000 upper-class families.

As for Coleman's marketing studies, he has a preference for certain types of products.

"I have always enjoyed studying the 'sin' products, like beer, cars or cigarettes, where people can be a bit naughty," he said.

"Everything that isn't of virtue is more fun. I love the seven deadly sins — they make life a hell on earth, but they make it more fun."

His laugh rolled out, but this time the smile followed.

It wasn't as if the reverse order made that much difference, it was just unexpected.

But then again, predictability is not his style.

Reagan urges halt of Soviet expansion

By The Associated Press

HONOLULU — President Reagan, hopping island to island across the ocean, urged China and other Pacific nations Tuesday to join the United States in "opposing expansionist aggression" by the Soviet Union.

Embarking on a trip across the international dateline and into Wednesday on the island of Guam, Reagan declared that "U.S.-China relations are good, and I believe they can and will get better."

"America and her Pacific neighbors are nations of the future. We must work with our friends to keep the Pacific truly peaceful — an ocean for commerce, not conflict," he said during a departure ceremony at Hickam Air Force Base in Honolulu.

Before a final briefing in Guam in preparation for his conferences in China, Reagan was scheduled to meet with the leaders of Micronesia, who were gathering on the small tropical island.

The Guamanians want to shift from their current status as an unincorporated government to U.S. commonwealth status similar to Puerto Rico.

At Hickam, the president said his trip to China "symbolizes the maturing of the United States' relationship with China," following Richard M. Nixon's trip there in 1972, the journey by Gerald R. Ford in 1975, and the normalization of diplomatic relations under Jimmy Carter in 1979.

Reagan said he wanted to convey the nation's "respect and friendship directly to the Chinese people," while offering cooperation with China's efforts to modernize its economy.

The United States and its Pacific neighbors, he said, "can go forward in a mighty enterprise to build dynamic growth economies, and make the world safer by working for peace and opposing expansionist aggression" — a reference to the Soviet Union.

The military role of the Soviets in the Pacific has been receiving considerable attention from the administration.

The White House press office shared data with reporters traveling with Reagan, showing the growth in Soviet ground divisions, ships, tactical aircraft and bombers in the Far East from 1968 until this year.

At the same time, it made available excerpts from a speech delivered March 6 by Adm. William J. Crowe, commander of the U.S. forces in the Pacific. In those remarks, Crowe said "it is in the Far Eastern arena that Moscow has made its most extensive military efforts in recent years."

"They can now attack not only our forces and bases in the western Pacific but reach the mid-Pacific, the Aleutians and parts of mainland Alaska," he said.

As the president was departing, a senior White House official, who asked to remain anonymous, made it clear an agreement on commercial nuclear power cooperation between the United States and China would be initiated by the United States while Reagan was in Peking.

"We've generally worked things out," he said, making the strongest statement to date indicating progress on the issue.

He said the sticking point over U.S. approval of the use of reprocessed nuclear fuel had been resolved. Such U.S. control is required under American law.

He said that any agreement initiated during the visit would then have to be signed later. He said Congress would have 60 days to disapprove the agreement and that if such action were not taken by both houses the measure would go into effect.

Meanwhile, Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger, in a speech prepared for delivery Tuesday in San Francisco, stressed the differences between the Soviet Union and China.

"Unlike the Soviets, who remain committed to the goal of replacing the existing international order with one of their own making, the Chinese made a carefully calculated decision to pursue their goals as a responsible member of the international community," he said.

"It is clearly in our interest and in the interests of the nations of the Pacific Basin that China remain on that path," Weinberger said.

The stop in Guam gave Reagan a chance to rest one more evening and confer with his most senior aides about the seven-to-eight hours of meetings he will have with the Chinese leaders.

Guam, 800 miles north of the equator and 3,700 miles west of Honolulu, was a key military staging area during the Vietnam War, with American B-52 bombers taking off from Andersen Air Force Base's sloping runway on their bombing missions.

Approximately 22 percent of the island population is made up of active duty U.S. military personnel and their dependents.

The island, volcanic in origin and approximately 30 miles long and four to nine miles wide, has been a U.S. territory since 1898. Its 106,000 residents have full U.S. citizenship.

Oklahoma snake hunt

Enthusiast tracks rattlers

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

Spring is noted each year by the appearance of shorts, sunbathers and motorcycles. But, for one man at K-State, spring is marked by the annual rattlesnake hunt held in Waynoka, Okla.

Doug Ackley, head of cashiers and loans in the comptroller's office, is one of 300 to 400 people who gather every year to compete for prizes being awarded for the largest, smallest, longest rattlesnake caught.

There also is a prize for the snake with the most rattles. A rattlesnake's age can be estimated by counting the number of rattles it has, Ackley said. One of Ackley's seven snakeskins has 11 rattles.

The Waynoka Saddle Club sponsors the hunt.

"They have organized hunts for people who don't know where to go and want to be guided and led out in the hills. A guide will take them out and show them how to hunt, where to hunt and what to look for," Ackley said.

There are also veteran hunters who hunt the hills on their own and only meet when they return to camp at night.

The weather has a lot to do with whether a hunt will be successful, Ackley said. If it's cloudy or cool in the morning, the hunters won't see many snakes, but if the nights are cool and the days warm, the snakes come out to lie in the sunshine.

Because the hunt is held the week following Easter, the date fluctuates from early to late spring, and the hunters never know what kind of luck to expect, Ackley said.

One year, Ackley and his hunting partner Jack Bailey of Garden City caught 30 rattlesnakes, but they were accompanied by 12 other men that year. The most they have caught as a team is six. Like any hunting or fishing expedition, the number caught varies with each trip, Ackley said. Sometimes the men see a lot of snakes, while there were two or three years when they didn't catch any.

Hunting rattlesnake is similar to any other wild game hunt, except firearms aren't used, Ackley said. Instead, a four-foot-long catcher with three prongs on one end is standard equipment. Purchased 16 years ago, Ackley said he considers it the best investment he ever made.

"We were like everybody else. When you think of catching snakes you (think of using) a broomstick with a rope that you get around their head and lasso it. But when you're out there, you can't get around either end of them a lot of times because they're wound around the brush or in a hole. So you need to grab them wherever you can, pull them out in the open, then re-catch them around the head before you bag them," Ackley said.

It's important to get the catcher as close to the head as possible so that when the snake is lowered into the burlap sack it doesn't bite the person holding the bag, Ackley said.

The territory where the hunt takes place is an area of flat-topped mesas with rocks around the edge. Snakes are cold blooded animals and they hibernate underground near these rocks all winter, Ackley said. When the weather begins to warm, the snakes like to go out in the morning, lay on the rocks and sunbathe. During the day when it gets too hot, they go back into hiding in their holes.

The three kinds of rattlesnakes generally caught at the hunt are the prairie rattler which has a spotty pattern, the diamond-back which has a diamond pattern on its back, and the Timber rattler.

"We're talking about six-foot snakes as big around as your arm," Ackley said.

"I can't explain how hard they are to see because they blend in so well with the foliage around them. You really have to look hard to see them a lot of times," he said.

Ackley said that during one hunt, he was looking into a hole in the earth's slope when he noticed something move out of the corner of his eye. It looked like a cow pod, but it was a rattlesnake coiled up about 18 inches from his face.

"He was just sitting there, and if he had wanted to, he could have just reached up and bit me. It kind of shook me for a while," Ackley said.

He managed to calmly back off, moving very slowly while the snake watched him.

The snake didn't move until Ackley put the catcher on him.

"Rattlesnakes are really non-aggressive. They stay pretty docile, even though they'll look right at you. They'll not even move until you get your catcher on. Then they just start biting anything they can find. Sometimes they'll even bite themselves," Ackley said.

"There have been some people bitten down there (Oklahoma), but there's never been anybody who's died from a snake bite down there. A rattlesnake bite, unless you're allergic to it, will not kill you if you get to a doctor within a reasonable amount of time and get some serum," he said.

"They have a club down there called the White Fang Club, and you're automatically a member if you get bitten," he said.

After they finish snake hunting a hill, Ackley and Bailey carry their sack of snakes to a cage kept in the back of their vehicle.

"We keep them alive until we get back to Pratt," Ackley said. At Bailey's parent's house the two begin the process of butchering the snakes. They cut off their heads, slit their bellies, gut them and peel the skin off.

"Even though the head alone is sitting on the ground, the snake will open its mouth, and if you stick something in it, it will bite it," Ackley said. When they finish, the skin and the snake meat is all that remains.

"We had them in a pan of water (the skinned snake meat) until we could do something else with them. We did one, turned around, and started to do another one when Jack's mom screamed. The snake was recoiling in the pan with no head, no skin and no guts. It was just continuing to do this coiling and recoiling in real slow motion," Ackley said. It had managed to recoil out of the pan, onto the car hood and down to the ground.

The hunters soak the skins in borax, then glycerol for 48 hours to make them pliable for tanning. The skins can be used to make belts, hatbands and other leather goods or mounted for hanging on the wall. Ackley brings the snake meat back to Manhattan and freezes it for later meals.

"It's exciting. It's the ultimate thrill of victory and agony of defeat," Ackley said.

Staff/Allen Eymstone

Doug Ackley, head of cashiers and loans in the comptroller's office, displays one of his seven rattlesnake skins. He and his hunting partner for 16 years, Jack Bailey of Garden City, travel to Waynoka, Okla., each spring to capture the snakes.

Popcorn crop requires adequate irrigation in Kansas fields

By TIM STRODA
Contributing Writer

Although it is not a normal crop seen growing in the fields of Kansas, popcorn is being grown near Manhattan.

"Popcorn is good for you and it doesn't cause cancer," Ed Irvine, local popcorn producer, said.

Irvine, a 1983 graduate in agronomy, plants popcorn on about 12 acres of irrigated farm land located north of Manhattan.

"I wouldn't even suggest planting popcorn in this area if irrigation water wasn't available," Irvine said.

"The availability of moisture is very important to regular field corn during the period when the ear is filling out, but it is even more critical that popcorn have adequate moisture during this time," he said.

Popcorn is grown similarly to field corn, but there are certain differences such as the number of plants per acre and weed control. It usually will yield about three-fifths of what field corn will.

"Popcorn is grown for quality, not quantity. If the kernel isn't plump and full, it won't pop well," Irvine said.

A goal of Irvine's is to keep his popcorn's test weight of 60 pounds per bushel. He's achieved this goal the past two years. His popcorn has averaged about 65 pounds per bushel, he said.

Another goal of Irvine's is to keep the popping volume of his popcorn between 37 and 43. Popping volume refers to the increase in volume of unpopped corn after it's popped. For example, if a cup of unpopped corn expanded into a volume of 40 cups when popped, that certain cup of unpopped corn is said to have a popping volume of 40.

Commercial handlers of popcorn use a Metric Weight Volume Tester. It consists of a popper mounted on a frame with a long cylinder underneath into which the popped corn falls. This cylinder is calibrated into spaces so a cup used for measuring unpopped corn will fill the cylinder exactly one space.

Irvine said he has his popcorn run through a commercial processor.

The processor first dries the corn in a special dryer that leaves the corn at an equal moisture content.

The corn is then run over a fanning mill to remove pieces of the cob, chaff and damaged kernels. The mill then screens out the very large and very small kernels, he said.

Next, the corn is run over a gravity separator to remove light or damaged kernels which couldn't be taken out by the fanning mill. The gravity separator saves inspecting the popcorn by hand.

Often the tips of many ears are damaged by corn ear worms, and the kernels around the damaged tips become moldy and discolored. Much of this discolored material can be removed only by the gravity separator, Irvine said. This is essential if a high-quality product is produced.

The popcorn is then run through a polishing machine which cleans off any chaff which might still be clinging to the tips of the kernels.

The popcorn is finally ready to be packaged. Commercial processors use several types of packaging depending on the needs of their customers, Irvine said.

The wholesale trade, such as large theater chains, use 100, 50 or 25 pound moisture-proof bags.

Retail customers use a variety of containers like sealed cans, glass jars or plastic containers.

Popcorn will last indefinitely in moisture-constant containers. Age won't hurt popcorn if the moisture is kept constant.

Popcorn can be marketed on the open market, sold to a wholesaler on contract or sold to people in the producer's community.

"Popcorn is a specialty crop, and I sell my popcorn where ever I can," Irvine said.

The price Irvine said he gets for his product is as varied as the ways he can sell it. The highest price he usually receives is from local people who only want a small amount. Selling to a wholesaler on the open market is next on the price scale. Putting his product on contract with a wholesaler is the least profitable.

"Many people have misconceptions about popcorn," Irvine said. Some popcorn retailers advertise that their popcorn is hull-less.

"There is no such thing as an absolutely hull-less popcorn. The hull is the pericarp or outer covering of the kernel," Irvine said.

There is also some confusion about popcorn color. The white or yellow appearance is in the endosperm or starchy part of the kernel. The blue, red, calico or brown color is located in the pericarp or in the aleurone, a thin layer of cells just below the hull.

"No matter the color of the unpopped kernel, the popcorn will be yellowish white after it is popped," he said.

"Popcorn, after it's popped, comes in two shapes, mushroom and butterfly," Irvine said.

The mushroom type is almost a round ball, which is preferred by operators of vending machines. The butterfly type which has an irregular, branched or pronged appearance, is preferable to some because it has a higher popping volume than the mushroom.

Because popcorn contains no sugar, it is a good between-meal snack, Irvine said.

'Fanny and Alexander': a tribute to Bergman's film career

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Ingmar Bergman claims that "Fanny and Alexander" will be his final film. If that is true, then he has created a tribute to his entire career.

Review

Many of the themes of past Bergman films can be found in "Fanny and Alexander." It's a film that isn't content to have only two or three topics; it reaches out across the breadth of Bergman's career, evoking elements of the surreal and supernatural as well as of comedy and melodrama. Usually when a filmmaker tries to include so many different elements in a film, the results are complete chaos — never being quite satisfactory on any one level. "Fanny and Alexander," though, is magnificently successful in each of its facets.

The story is roughly broken into three segments. The first creates in great detail the home of a theatrical family — the Ekdahls — as they get together for the Christmas holiday. No one character actually steps out as being the central character at this time. In fact, the only indication that Fanny and Alexander will ultimately be the central characters comes from the film's title. Equal time is devoted to each member of the family. This means that more than twelve characters are introduced in the film's first few minutes. And while not all of these characters end up playing a crucial role in the drama to follow, they all contribute strongly in creating the atmosphere of this Norwegian family of 1907.

Bergman is able to imbue all these scenes with such an engaging style that, while the film may seem to meander, interest never wanes. It is the house itself that becomes the true star of these scenes. It is an enormous, ornate mansion. There are red velvet curtains, gold-leafed framed paintings, plush divans, intricate woodwork and all the flashy reds, greens and golds of Christmas. The film's audience, in a sense, becomes another member of the family as the camera weaves through the crowd, carrying the viewer along as the family parades in song around the house.

The second section of the film begins upon the death of Fanny and Alexander's father. They watch as their mother wails beside her dead husband's coffin. It's a scene that is as haunting as any in recent memory. It is then that Fanny and Alexander finally emerge as the film's central characters. They are followed closely as months later their mother accepts the marriage proposal of a bishop. But this man professes a "though shall not..." form of religion where faith is measured in terms of fear instead of love. He insists that his new family leave behind their possessions when they move into his house — a barren, cold environment with hardly any furnishings and no ornaments.

In these scenes, Bergman pushes the bishop to the point of satire, making him and his home appear as inhospitable and destructive as possible. It is Isak the Jew — Grandmother Ekdahl's suitor — who comes to the rescue. The elements of the supernatural are brought out strongest at this point. Isak provides a fine bit of magic in getting the children out of their locked room. He then takes them back to his pawnshop where long dark passages wind back upon themselves and life-sized puppets dangle from the ceiling. It is here that Alexander undergoes a mystical initiation where he evokes a power that ignites the bishop's home. The film's final scenes show the entire Ekdahl family getting together again, just as they were at the film's beginning.

As usual, Sven Nykvist's cinematography is quite breathtaking — he won the 1964 Academy Award for cinematography. While his use of colors may seem a little too preconceived at times to be believable, the events are given the aura of the slight distortions of memory. This gives Bergman and Nykvist the license to bathe the rooms with colors that seem impossibly rich.

The film jumps back and forth between scenes of fantasy and reality with an apparent ease. It moves with the grace of a Dickens novel, being large in scope and jerking forward in large episodic surges. Bergman never comes straight out and makes it clear what parts are fantasy and what parts are supposed to be real; he allows the audience to be drawn into world of the child's imagination while never forcing particular beliefs. It is the imagination of someone who has experienced the great joys of life and has also survived the darkest of times, knowing that almost anything is possible as long as the individual has the will to turn his dreams into reality.

In the end, Bergman has seemed to reach a state of tranquility where the hope for fulfilled life can exist. "Fanny and Alexander" ends not on a note of despair or anguish, but upon his personal vision that the world is full of many wonders just outside our normal range of sight. These wonders can be found by those people who only have the imagination to reach out beyond their normal existence.

Three team up to perform ballads at Nooner

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

Although plagued and delayed by an irritating sound system, Tony Ridder, sophomore in fine arts; Greg Bryant, who received a master's degree in English in 1982; and Robert Starnes, Manhattan resident; took the sting out of studying during a 70-degree day while performing at a Nooner on Tuesday in the Union Catskeller.

Review

Ridder, who sang the lead in most of the songs, was accompanied by Starnes on the acoustic guitar and Bryant on bass guitar. They performed several ballads which had rich lyrics and vivid stories.

A number of the songs came from Harry Chapin, who specialized in writing and performing such story-telling melodies. Ridder was perfect in matching Chapin's style in voice and beat — especially as he performed "Mayor of Canda."

"Mayor of Canda" tells the story of a man who falls in love with the mayor's daughter, whose father he can't stand. The young man later learns that her father has sent her away to school in a foreign country to get her away from him. In his inquisition of why the mayor sent her away, the man finds out the mayor is his father and the girl he loved his half sister.

Another very effective performance was given by the three men with Cat Stevens' "Wild World" and Chapin's "Roll on River." The performance was unique in that both dealt with the theme of losing a mate, one song was sympathetic with the situation while the other was cold and angry. The change in tone and style perfectly relayed the feelings of the songwriters' intended emotions.

Ridder said the three never really performed together, but they interacted and complimented each other's abilities perfectly when harmonizing "He Was a Friend of Mine," which told the story of John F. Kennedy's death.

The best performance came at the end with Chapin's "Remember When," which was a tribute to John Lennon. Chapin himself, Ridder said, died in car accident about a month after finishing the song. Ridder switched over to harmonica with "Mail Order Annie," also by Chapin.

Bryant also performed excellently when singing Merle Haggard's "Farmers Daughter" during a solo. His instrumentation and voice seemed perfectly adapted to that style of music.

Each member could have easily performed a very successful solo, but instead opted to combine their talents to sound three times better. Too bad Nooners only last an hour.

KC singer to perform

Kansas City singer Marilyn Maye, who last appeared at K-State in 1978, is scheduled to perform at 8 p.m. today in McCain Auditorium. Maye's appearance will serve as a benefit concert for the K-State Department of Music.

REASON #2 TO CALL A FRIEND:

YOUR SANITY.

College life can have an unsettling effect on your state of mind. From sitting in strange classes to living with even stranger people.

Sometimes it feels like the only person you can really talk to is yourself.

Well, you know what they say about people who talk to themselves. So call an old friend instead.

Even if your friends are far away, they still know you and care about you. And they won't judge you by your choice of major or the condition of your laundry.

Calling a friend is the best therapy for the money, too. Call after 11 PM weeknights or between 11 PM Friday and 5 PM Sunday when rates are the lowest.

So call a friend or two, and tell them just how crazy it's been. You'll be surprised how sane it can make you feel.

K-State's Ray Hansen threw the javelin 260-feet-10 March 31 at R.V. Christian Track to qualify for the 1984 Olympic trials.

Local athlete dreams of Olympic competition

By BRAD NADING
Collegian Reporter

Qualifying to participate in the Olympic Games is a dream of many athletes, but most are unable to qualify for the predecessor of the Olympics — the Olympic trials.

For one K-State athlete, the first step toward representing the United States has been accomplished. With a throw of 260-feet-10 in the javelin competition during a meet at R.V. Christian Track on March 31, Ray Hansen qualified for both the National Collegiate Athletic Association meet and the Olympic trials.

"The Olympics is a dream I have, but I was sure I could throw it far enough to qualify for the trials. I'm glad I did it in the first meet so I got rid of that pressure," Hansen said.

Hansen has enjoyed sports much of his life, and was primarily a football player, cross country runner and baseball player in high school. He could be called a late bloomer in javelin competition, since he didn't start throwing until his junior year at Quachita Parish High School in Monroe, La.

"I was mainly a distance runner in track until I picked up one (javelin) a couple of days before a meet and started throwing," Hansen said. "In my first meet I got second with around 180 feet. I really surprised my coach."

Hansen said the major reason for switching to javelin was that he grew four inches and gained 40 pounds, which caused him to lose his speed in the running events.

He began college at Northeastern Louisiana University, a four-year institution, but he said he transferred to K-State because of the chances for advancement in the sport.

When Steve Miller became head track coach at K-State three years ago, Hansen was in his red-shirt year.

"We tried to change Raymond's style to a natural strength thrower through heavy training and adding weight, but found he lost speed and flexibility. Then we found he worked best with the extra pounds off,"

Yankees blank Royals, 4-0

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Unbeaten Phil Niekro scattered eight hits Tuesday for his fourth American League victory and was backed by Butch Wynegar's two-run single and Don Mattingly's solo home run as the New York Yankees blanked the Kansas City Royals 4-0.

Niekro, 45, who signed a two-year contract with the Yankees after being released by the Atlanta Braves following the 1983 season, is the oldest pitcher in the major leagues.

He struck out eight, walked one and allowed only one runner to reach third base in gaining his 44th career shutout. He has not allowed a run in his last 21 1-3 innings. It was the veteran knuckleballer's 272nd career victory and first complete game this season.

Baseball squad claims first Big Eight victory

The K-State baseball team finally picked up that elusive first Big Eight Conference victory Monday, splitting a double-header with the University of Kansas at Lawrence.

The Jayhawks won the opener in a slugfest, 15-13, but the Wildcats came back to win the second game, 18-2.

Kansas slugged seven home runs in the opener. KU shortstop Joe Heeney hit three home runs, one inside the park.

Cary Colbert provided much of the fire power for the Wildcats. Colbert had a single, a two-run homer and a three-run homer in the second game.

He also blasted a three-run homer in the first game. For the day, Colbert was 6-for-8 with 11 RBIs.

The three home runs gave Colbert 24 for his career to make him K-State's career home run leader.

In the second game, Wildcat starter Scott Lichlyter went the distance, holding KU to eight hits and striking out four. His record is now 2-3.

K-State is 1-15 in the conference and 11-21 overall. The 'Cats are next scheduled to play a twin bill against the University of Missouri at noon Saturday at Frank Meyers Field.

Soviets may compete in LA games

By The Associated Press

LAUSANNE, Switzerland — If the organizers of the Summer Olympics at Los Angeles uphold the Olympic Charter, the Soviet Union will attend the Games, officials of the United States and the Soviet Union said Tuesday.

Peter Ueberroth, president of the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee and the chief U.S. representative at the talks between the two countries, refused to characterize the meeting as a "breakthrough" guaranteeing Soviet attendance. But he said he would guarantee that the LAOOC would comply with the Charter.

"There has been some progress, but this is not a breakthrough," Ueberroth emphasized after a meeting with Marat Gramov, chief of the Soviet Olympic Committee.

"The Soviet Union's National Olympic Committee declares that Soviet athletes have the firm intention of participating in the Games in Los Angeles at the 23rd Olympiad under the condition that the Olympic Charter is enforced," a joint communique said.

It added, "The Los Angeles Committee gave its assurances in declarations that the Olympic Charter would be entirely respected."

The communique was issued after a four-hour meeting between Ueberroth and Gramov at International Olympic Committee headquarters.

Juan Antonio Samaranch, president of the IOC, had called the session in response to Soviet charges that the U.S. had violated the Charter.

"I'm very happy with the results of the meetings," Samaranch said. "We may say that the black clouds in the Olympic sky have vanished or will very soon disappear."

Gramov, however, would not say definitely that the Soviets would attend the Games.

"A step forward has been made, by getting rid of some impediments which had been accumulating recently," he said. "I'm satisfied with the assurances given by Mr. Ueberroth. But a number of questions still have to be discussed. I'm sure that with further close contact with the LAOOC, the problems will be solved."

None of the three officials would say categorically that the Soviets would commit themselves to attending the Olympics by the June 2 IOC deadline for declaring intent to participate.

The Soviets have said they do not intend to boycott the Olympics as the U.S. did in 1980 at Moscow in protest of the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan. But they have not ruled out withholding their athletes over alleged U.S. violations of the Charter.

Ueberroth said that the LAOOC would maintain daily contact with the Soviets. "I think that by communicating on a daily basis on every issue, small and large, there will be no gaps in our understanding, such as the gaps which have been closed today," he said.

Among the elements apparently agreed upon during Tuesday's meeting were allowing the Soviets and other nations to submit lists of participants to the LAOOC instead of U.S. embassies and consulates.

Hansen

Miller said.

In 1982, Hansen was an All-American selection, using the European style of throwing, turning his arm and body away from the field and then turning back at the release. Hansen finished 10th in the NCAA meet and first in the Big Eight Conference meet.

Last year he suffered a groin injury at the nationals while warming up. Hansen said he is healed physically, but the injury still plays on his mental attitude occasionally. "It still bothers me a little. I can feel it sometimes and wonder how long I can last. I'm just cautious," he said.

This season, Hansen said he has changed part of his style.

"I guess you'd call it a combination of the American and European styles," he said. "The American keeps the body and arm pointed straight at the field. I'm in between."

Relaxation and calm thinking are part of the preparation for a throw. He said he has the approach memorized after doing it so many times.

"I just count to myself: One, two... up to nine, and then one, two and let it go. I let the Lord take care of it," Hansen said.

Miller said Hansen fits into the mold of historically strong javelin throwers at K-State and in the Big Eight.

"This is an unusual year. We think Raymond will win because the closest throw to his this year is a KU freshman, but he's 20-40 feet behind him (Hansen)," Miller said.

In the NCAA meet, Miller said Hansen should finish in the top six, but the top three from last year are coming back. A throw of 303 feet won the meet last year. Miller said Hansen should finish in the top three Americans.

As for the 1984 Olympics, Hansen said his goal is to finish in the top eight at the trials. Three throwers will make the Olympic squad. He said he is shooting more for the 1988 games.

"Most javelin throwers are physically mature when they're between 26-30 years old. I'm 23 now, and by 1988 I should be in top form," Hansen said. "About five of the top throwers in the nation are at that level now, so my chances look better for 1988."

Miller said it takes three things to be in the Olympics, and Hansen lacks some of these. First, the athlete must be lucky. Second, the athlete must have the ability to compete, and last, the athlete must be in the right place at the right time and be totally prepared.

"Success is being ready when the opportunity arises," Miller said.

While on the track squad, Hansen said he also thinks he is coaching a little.

"I love track. I try to instill enthusiasm in others by keeping up with all the events," Hansen said. "I think there's something unique here at K-State. Usually the different events, such as distance runners, sprinters and field keep in their own little groups. I don't think that's the case here. I have Christian brothers in many of the events, and we all encourage each other."

After graduating this semester, Hansen said he hopes to obtain a coaching job. If that doesn't work out, he said he plans to stay in Manhattan and train with the track squad. He said there's always a chance that someone might want to sponsor his training.

"I'd like to stay around next year not only to train, but also to continue instructing in the campus ministries for high school students," he said.

Miller said Hansen is a true team leader.

"Raymond is genuinely a good person who actually lives his life by the Christian ways. He doesn't just say he does, he does it. But he is able to summon the energy needed to be volatile in competition. The only thing bad about him is that sometimes he's too good," Miller said. "He's all the things that everyone would like to be like."

For Ray Hansen, the Olympic dream continues.

Child's court appearance frees mother Classified

By The Associated Press

DENVER — A 12-year-old boy who doesn't want to live with his homosexual father came out of hiding Tuesday and appeared before a judge who must decide a bitter custody fight between the father and the boy's fundamentalist mother.

The appearance of Brian Batey at the Denver City and County Building meant that his mother, Betty Lou Batey, could be freed from jail, where she had spent 12 days for refusing to reveal his whereabouts.

"I want to live with my mother," Brian told reporters who surrounded him as soon as he appeared in a hallway outside the courtroom where his mother waited before a criminal court judge.

After a hearing, Denver Domestic Relations Judge Harold Reed reversed an earlier decision and refused to return Brian immediately to his father, Frank Batey, who won custody of the boy in 1982 after a protracted fight in Southern California.

Reed ordered Brian held in the Denver Crisis Center for up to two weeks while Colorado authorities research the case.

"I don't want him in handcuffs, obviously," Reed told a deputy sheriff. "He's not a prisoner."

Reed also granted Brian's request to attend services at the Lovingway United Pentecostal Church in Aurora, east of Denver, the congregation of which has filled various courtrooms in support of Mrs. Batey since she turned herself over to the FBI on April 4.

"I'm doing this for your best interests," Reed told Brian.

Denver District Judge Robert

Fullerton said Mrs. Batey was wanted on a California warrant charging her with violation of custody. He jailed her April 12, saying she would not be freed until Brian came out of hiding. Tuesday, he reduced her bond from $25,000 to $5,000 and she posted bail.

Mrs. Batey has said she contacted the FBI early this month because she was tired of being a fugitive.

Brian said little during his court appearances. He talked calmly with reporters, though his answers were brief.

Since leaving California, Brian said, he and his mother had spent all but the last month and a half in Texas.

Frank Batey of Palm Springs, Calif., told reporters a few weeks ago that he feared Brian had been "brainwashed" by the Rev. Maurice Gordon, pastor at Lovingway United Pentecostal. Gordon had announced to the media on Monday that Brian would appear at the courthouse on Tuesday.

Batey's Colorado attorney, who was not in court Tuesday, is to meet with Reed today, the judge said.

Brian, who will be 13 on May 15, was asked if he had been brainwashed. "Yeah. By my father," he shot back.

Chief Denver Deputy District Attorney William Buckley said authorities would consider placing Brian in a Denver-area foster home or institution if Reed decides he needs more time before making a final decision in the case.

Such a place, Buckley added, would have to be "a neutral setting where both parents will be able to see him but not take him."

Survey indicates 93 percent of hospital bills inaccurate

Editor's note: This is the second of a series of articles written by members of the K-State Consumer Relations Board to educate readers on topics of consumer interest as part of National Consumer Awareness Week this week.

By JUDY BROWN
Contributing Writer

A recent survey by Equifax of Atlanta, Ga., indicates that 93 percent of all hospital bills are incorrect, and 85 percent of those errors are in the hospital's favor. Here are some suggested ways for consumers to help prevent such errors.

1) Patients should insist on receiving an itemized hospital bill, not just a bottom-line total. If the charges are not understood or if the bill is coded, an explanation should be requested.

2) If a consumer is billed for medical services he did not receive, the hospital should be informed — first by phone, then in writing. The consumer should keep a copy for his files.

3) Patients should make sure that fees from doctors, surgeons, anesthetists, therapists, etc., aren't higher than the amount agreed upon.

Keeping a "hospital diary" is the newest trend in consumer self-protection. Because it is very hard to recall names, dates, times and procedures when ill, many patients are asking doctors to sign a bedside notebook, giving their name, the date and time. This gives patients their own record to check against hospital and physician bills. It also provides the name of the doctor to question should there be a problem. Lab tests, therapy sessions, special equipment used, plus dates and hours of private-duty nurses also should be recorded for future reference.

Most patients are careless about their records because insurance companies pay their medical bills. They think the insurance company will find errors, or they assume that overcharges won't affect their medical costs. They are wrong, however. Everyone ultimately pays for these mistakes in the form of higher premiums, and everyone has an interest in keeping hospital charges from increasing.

Panel advises no action on drinking bill

By MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

TOPEKA — The Kansas Senate Committee on Federal and State Affairs voted Wednesday to recommend that the Senate take no action on raising the legal drinking age to 19 or older during the 1984 session.

The recommendation, which came after an open hearing and committee meeting, is to include a proposal to establish an interim committee to study means of alleviating drunken driving.

The study should include an evaluation of the legal drinking age, the issue of proper education about alcohol awareness, enforcement of the law and an analysis of conflicting statistics from supporters and opponents of raising the drinking age, Sen. Edward Reilly, R-Leavenworth and committee chairman, said.

Supporters and opponents of a conference committee recommendation to raise the legal drinking age in Kansas testified before the Federal and State Affairs Committee. Lobbying groups, activist groups and concerned students were present at the hearing. After the hearing, committee members went into a closed session to consider testimony and formulate recommendations to present to the Senate.

Supporters of raising the legal drinking age argued that statistics show states which have raised the drinking age to 21 have decreased the number of alcohol-

Brett Lambert, K-State ASK campus director, expresses his point of view concerning the drinking age bill to Steve Hamilton of Lincoln, Neb., following a hearing of the Kansas Senate's Federal and State Affairs Committee on Wednesday in Topeka. Lambert testified against raising the drinking age, and Hamilton favors the bill.

Insurance plan may make maternity coverage optional

By KARLA PORTER
Staff Writer

A proposed change in the student health insurance policy which would take maternity benefits out of general coverage and make them an optional rider will be considered tonight by Student Senate.

The Lafene Student Health Advisory Committee, which negotiates with insurance companies to determine K-State's student health insurance program, will present senate with a cost comparison of the insurance premiums with and without maternity benefits.

Lisa Heiniger, committee chairman and senior in pre-medicine, said premium rates will be higher if maternity benefits are included in the policy.

"It (the proposed change) is for the benefit of most of the students," she said.

"There are not too many students who want the maternity coverage in the policy."

The committee decided on the new policy and then accepted bids from insurance companies, she said. Last year's representative was Trans-America Occidental, but this year the lowest bid came from Keystone Insurance.

With Keystone, premium rates are 10 percent lower without maternity benefits. For one-year coverage, the premium rate for single students is $390, student/spouse $925, student/children $895, and student/spouse and children $1,290. If the plan is offered with maternity coverage automatically included for all students, the rates would be $429, $1,017, $984 and $1,419, respectively.

If the insurance is offered without maternity coverage, students who want that coverage would be able to get it by paying an optional $400 maternity "rider." Under the policy, the maximum maternity benefit which can be collected is $1,000, Heiniger said.

"It makes it real expensive for any student who wants to get maternity coverage," she said. "We just want to give Student Senate and students a chance to see the difference in rates with maternity benefits and without it."

Under the current insurance plan by Occidental which includes automatic maternity coverage, single students pay $337 per year, student/spouse $660, student/children $714 and student/spouse and children $1,046. According to the company's bid for next year, these prices would have increased if the committee had decided to continue to offer coverage by Occidental.

Heiniger said health insurance does involve paying for other people's illnesses or accidents.

"That's just part of health insurance. It's for your benefit," she said. "They (other people) are paying for you, too."

Maternity coverage is different only because of the added cost and past abuse, she said. Statistics provided by Occidental indicated that many students took out insurance with the sole purpose of having a child. Occidental's figures said $423,000 was paid in premiums during 1982-1983. There were $170,000 in maternity claims out of $860,000 in claims from K-State.

Mike Turner, committee member and senior in pre-medicine, said although maternity benefits were equal to more than 40 percent of the premiums paid to Occidental, only 5 to 8 percent of the students enrolled in the policy ever use maternity benefits.

The committee checked the legality of the change with Dick Seaton, University attorney. Seaton agreed to make a written statement confirming the legality of the change for the committee to use in its presentation to senate, Turner said.

The current policy was established in 1976 after a University-wide "self-study" of Title IX, which prohibits sex discrimination in education. Dorothy Thompson, director of Affirmative Action and a member of that investigative committee, said the committee recommended the inclusion of maternity benefits in the insurance policy.

The report stated: (The regulation) "provides that pregnancy-related disabilities must be treated as any other temporary disability. Therefore, it appears that, to be in compliance with the Regulation, pregnancy-related coverage should be included in the basic plan."

Thompson said everything changed with

Reagans arrive in Peking amid fanfare, begin China tour

By The Associated Press

PEKING — President Reagan, who spent a generation as one of the United States' harshest critics of China, arrived in this communist-ruled Chinese capital today on the final leg of a 9,290 mile journey across the Pacific Ocean.

Air Force One, with the president and his wife, Nancy, aboard, touched down at 1:05 a.m. EST after a six-hour flight from Guam.

A bouquet from school children and a low-key welcome, led by Foreign Minister Wu Xuesian, awaited the Reagans at the Peking Capital Airport, followed by a 30-minute motorcade ride from downtown, before a more formal welcome at Tiananmen Square, the largest public square in the world, and a conference with President Li Xiannian in the Great Hall of the People.

From the start, the day was offering the president glimpses of the Chinese people and their country, with his motorcade route taking him down tree-lined roads and past small farms on the approach to the sprawling capital city.

At Tiananmen Square, where more than a million people can gather for patriotic holidays and celebrations, Reagan was coming face-to-face with symbols of the old and new in China: to the north is the Gate of Heavenly Peace, at the outer wall of the imperial Forbidden City, and a towering portrait of the late Chairman Mao Tse-tung; to the south is the "Great Helmsman's" mausoleum.

The Reagans were assigned elegant quarters at the Diaoyutai state guest house, a walled compound reserved for distinguished visitors. The compound, decorated with willow trees and a meandering stream carrying water from the western hills, is on land used by members of the imperial family as far back as 1115 A.D.

Premier Zhao Ziyang invited the Reagans to a welcoming dinner on the Diaoyutai grounds.

Reagan will spend 5½ days in China, on the first visit there by a U.S. president since Gerald R. Ford's journey in 1975. That followed Richard Nixon's historic trip to China in 1972.

The approach of the Reagan journey spurred U.S. and Chinese negotiators to reach an agreement that White House officials say will pave the way for U.S. companies to bid on lucrative commercial nuclear power contracts being offered by China. It was considered almost certain that it would be initiated during the visit.

"The United States and the People's Republic of China are very close to a final nuclear agreement," White House spokesman Larry Speakes said Wednesday. All that remained was for congressional leaders to give informal approval over the next few days.

While the president is meeting with Chinese officials, Mrs. Reagan planned to visit the Peking Zoo and other attractions.

With the repudiation by the mid-1970s of the radical Cultural Revolution and the arrival of a moderate era under Deng Xiaoping, China has opened itself more to the West while liberalizing its economy and encouraging limited private enterprise.

Reagan, who said in 1978 that it was "absolutely untrue" that he would visit Peking, and emphasized that the United States "must not abandon its friends on Taiwan or weaken our mutual defense treaty with them," was set for hours of meetings with China's leaders.

After decades of criticizing the People's Republic of China and defending the Nationalist forces that fled to Taiwan in 1949, Reagan's "natural inclination to be cautious in his approach to China is still with him," said a senior White House official.

Bush defends aid to El Salvador

By The Associated Press

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Vice President George Bush was in Missouri Wednesday to talk about farm policy, but turned to the defense of the Reagan administration's policies in Central America after he was confronted by demonstrators.

Bush was interrupted by several demonstrators protesting against U.S. aid to El Salvador when he started to address agriculture students at the University of Missouri in Columbia.

"As students and farmers, we are outraged by the military intervention in Central America," Mark Drye, 21, of Columbia, a senior in agricultural journalism and representative of a group called the Student-Farmer Peace Alliance, said in a statement he read while Bush tried to speak.

Others in the crowd of 400 students and spectators shouted at Drye to "go home" and "shut up." At one point, the vice president told Drye: "I'll answer your question if you'll ask it and shut up."

Bush said the Reagan administration's moves in El Salvador and elsewhere in Central America were aimed at securing democratic rights for people of those countries against Marxists and supported by Cuban Premier Fidel Castro.

The vice president said administration policies are aimed at preventing further intervention by Castro and his forces. "One Castro there is one too many," he said.

Bush was greeted at the auditorium by a handful of protesters carrying signs with slogans such as "Why send guns when people are starving?" and "U.S. bullets decide El Salvador elections."

When he turned to his prepared speech, Bush said the best answer for improving the lot of family farmers and American agriculture in general was to improve farm exports.

He said inflation was the biggest problem facing farmers when the Reagan administration took office and noted that the rate of inflation had dropped since then.

"We know that interest rates are much too high for farmers and we're working hard to bring them down further," he said.

Another big problem facing farmers and the economy in general, Bush said, is the size of the federal deficit. The Reagan administration will work with Congress to cut the deficit, he said, "but never at the expense of the people's tax cut."

Bush later addressed about 500 Republican loyalists at a luncheon in a country-western auditorium near Columbia and reiterated his support for the Reagan policies in Central America.

"Because of Ronald Reagan," the vice president said, "El Salvador has a fighting chance to preserve its democracy against communist subversion."

Bush said the intervention in Grenada had maintained that island nation as a free country and he criticized the three Democratic presidential hopefuls as prophets of "doom and gloom."

Gov. Christopher Bond, a Republican, spoke at the party rally and said Reagan and Bush had turned the country around and curbed what he referred to as "the monstrous inflation" caused by Democrats.

Young Kennedy found in Florida hotel; police officials deny foul play in death

By The Associated Press

PALM BEACH, Fla. — David Anthony Kennedy, the 28-year-old son of the late Sen. Robert Kennedy, was found dead in his hotel room Wednesday, police said.

Kennedy had a history of drug problems, but police would not immediately say what caused the death, except that there was no evidence of foul play.

Palm Beach Police Sgt. Henry Marchman said the body was found in Room 107 of the Brazilian Court Hotel, where Kennedy had been staying alone.

Police Capt. William Shetro confirmed the body was Kennedy's.

"There's no sign of foul play. The investigation is continuing," he said.

A first aid call from the hotel was received by police between 11:35 a.m. and 11:40 a.m., Shetro said.

Josephine Dampier, the hotel manager's secretary, said Kennedy had checked in Friday with a brother, but she didn't know which one. Dampier said Kennedy had been in town on a family vacation, and had been going back and forth between the hotel and the nearby winter home of his grandmother, Rose Kennedy.

Dampier said the body was found by Elizabeth Barnett, a front desk secretary. Dampier said she asked her to check the room because a Mrs. Kennedy had called from Boston at around 11:30 a.m. and "asked if I'd mind checking David's room because none of the family had seen him since last night and he was supposed to be on a plane to Boston (Wednesday) morning."

Dampier said she did not know which Mrs. Kennedy it was that called.

In Washington, an aide to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Robert Shrum, said he had no details on the death. Shrum declined to say whether drugs were involved in the death.

But, in 1979, the then-24-year-old Kennedy reported he was robbed of $30 in a seedy Harlem hotel in New York City that police described as a dope supermarket.

A police source said at that time Kennedy was there to buy cocaine. Kennedy was then hospitalized with a heart infection that is sometimes associated with narcotics abuse.

After that, Kennedy was treated for drug addiction by Sacramento, Calif., drug abuse counselor Donald Juhl, who conducted "live-in" therapy.

In a brief statement, Sen. Kennedy said, "This is a very difficult time for all the members of our family, including David's mother, Ethel, and his brothers and sisters, who tried so hard to help him in recent years."

"All of us loved him very much. With trust in God, we all pray that David has finally found the peace that he did not find in life," he said.

David was the fourth of Robert and Ethel Kennedy's 11 children.

It was the latest in a series of tragedies for the Kennedy family, one of America's wealthiest and most politically prominent. Robert F. Kennedy was killed by an assassin in 1968 as he sought the Democratic nomination for president. His brother, President John F. Kennedy, was assassinated in 1963. Their older brother, Joseph Kennedy Jr., was killed in World War II.

In 1980, Kennedy was arrested for investigation of drunken driving. He later pleaded guilty and was fined $380 in Sacramento.

Kennedy re-enrolled at Harvard University in 1982, where he had a year to go toward an undergraduate degree. At that time, Juhl said the drug therapy had ended earlier in the year and added: "As far as the problems of the past go, they're all over. He is in no kind of trouble."

David's older brother, Robert Jr., was given a two-year suspended sentence in South Dakota last month for possessing heroin.

Students protest South Africa holdings

By The College Press Service

Organizers say recent coordinated nationwide demonstrations calling for more universities to sell their holdings in companies that do business in segregationist South Africa were "the largest anti-apartheid mobilization in several years."

The actual pace of campus administrators divesting their portfolios of shares in the firms has decreased in the last few years, however.

Called "Two Weeks of Anti-Apartheid Action," the protests, organized by the American Committee on Africa, stretched across scores of campuses from the last week of March through the first weeks of April.

Demonstrations took place at Florida State University, Duke University, the University of the District of Columbia, Harvard University, Kalamazoo College, the University of Oregon and the University of Southern California, among many other places, said Joshua Nessen, who coordinates campus activities from the ACOA office in New York City.

Nessen estimated the events involved "thousands" of students.

"They sent a strong message of opposition to U.S. investment in South Africa," he said.

"The demonstrations put our administration and other university administrators on notice that the divestment movement is broad-based and permanent," said Brooke Baldwin of the Yale Coalition Against Apartheid.

Judging just how this spring's protests measure against those of the past is difficult because the ACOA has lumped efforts with those of the nuclear freeze movement in 1982 and 1983.

But protests, while usually not as large as those surrounding other causes, have been almost constant.

Since last spring's major campus push, for example, students at the State University of New York at Binghamton boycotted a Ray Charles concert because Charles had recently performed in South Africa.

A Northern Illinois University student effort to mount a boycott of the university's alumni fund, which holds stock in firms that do business in South Africa, failed last fall when Operation PUSH, Jesse Jackson's organization in Chicago, refused to endorse the boycott.

Iowa State University's student government asked its governors to sell $700,000 worth of shares in certain companies, while minority faculty at Michigan State University petitioned to erase the name of John McGoff, a Michigan publisher on the South African government payroll, from a campus stage.

Most of the efforts, however, have fallen on deaf ears.

While scores of colleges and universities divested themselves of their interests in South Africa from 1978 through 1982, few schools have done so in recent years.

Most prominently, Minnesota toughened its South African policy in January, prohibiting university investments in firms that do not endorse the Sullivan Principles, a list of 14 civil rights for South African workers in American-controlled companies.

In February, Wesleyan University sold its shares in Newmont Mining when Newmont refused to sign an agreement to observe the Sullivan Principles.

No other campus administrations have sold shares this school year, however.

Groups to appeal for funds in last allocation session

Student Senate will meet at 6 p.m. today in the Union Big Eight Room to conclude consideration of a tentative allocations bill introduced by Finance Committee. Groups being considered are:

— Student Publications: 1983-1984 allocation $3 line item for full-time and $1 for part-time students; requesting $3 for full-time and $2 for part-time; recommendation $3 for full-time and $1 for part-time.

— K-State Union: 1983-1984 allocation $12 line item for full-time and $6 for part-time students; requesting same; recommendation same.

— Recreational Services: 1983-1984 allocation $2.50 line item for full-time and 75 cents for part-time students; requesting same; recommendation same.

— Honorariums: 1983-1984 allocation $4,600; requesting $9,200; recommendation $5,300.

Reconsideration will be given two groups which have already received tentative allocations:

— International Coordinating Council: requesting $7,192.41; tentative allocation $3,506.46.

— Early Childhood Laboratory: requesting $2,470; tentative allocation $0.

Senate will also consider two bills:

— Permission to commission an artist for Nichols Hall: first reading.

— Approval of 1984-1985 Student Health Insurance Plan: first reading.

Anyone may speak during open period at the beginning of the meeting.

related traffic fatalities. Some asserted that the current drinking age causes higher rates of alcoholism among people 18 to 21.

The Rev. Richard Taylor, spokesman for Kansans For Life At Its Best!, showed a videotape on the effects of lowering the drinking age from 21 to 18 in Michigan. The age was lowered in 1972, and by 1978 the state had raised its legal age back to 21. The information given in the tape cited a 21 percent decrease in alcohol-related accidents among 18- to 20-year olds in 1980.

Another supporter, Everett McBride, regional administrator for the National Highway and Traffic Administration, said there was a 28 percent decline of alcohol-related traffic deaths in states which have raised the age to 21. Raising the drinking age, as well as increased enforcement of drunken driving laws, is necessary, he said.

"The only way to save lives is to do a complete job," he said. "There's no inoculation against the drunken driver."

Opponents of the proposal included several beer distributors, a Lawrence police officer and lobbyists from the Associated Students of Kansas.

Mark Tallman, executive director of ASK, said a law increasing the drinking age would not command respect and would not be obeyed. Raising the drinking age is selective prohibition, he said.

"It is now commonly accepted that Prohibition didn't work because far too many Americans rejected the idea that government should take away the rights of all Americans to consume alcoholic beverages, when only a minority abused that right," he said.

Tallman said raising the drinking age would be discriminatory because it denies 18- to 20-year olds due process of the law. He said it denies an adult a legal right without being convicted of any crime.

Arguments against the proposal included an increase in alcohol abuse problems. Tallman said an increase in the drinking age would not stop young people who choose to drink. Drinking would take place in unsupervised areas, under-age drinkers would develop illicit sources to obtain alcohol and some may be tempted toward the "forbidden fruit" — hard liquor, he said.

Brett Lambert, K-State ASK campus director, said alcohol education, not legalization, is needed. Less than 31 percent of students surveyed on the K-State campus were aware of the blood alcohol content levels stated in current drunken driving laws, he said.

Two Topeka beer distributors, in separate testimony, also advocated education programs.

"Laws alone will not change the problem," Dick Eddington, of Eddington Distributors, said. "Only education concerning the responsible use of alcohol" will solve the problem, he said.

Group to distribute whistles, rape awareness information

In an effort to inform the community about rape, the Manhattan Coalition Against Rape will distribute whistles and rape awareness information from 10 a.m. to noon Saturday at four local banks.

The coalition asks for a $2 donation for each whistle distributed to help the organization pay for the whistles. Members of the group will be at the Kansas State Bank, 11th Street and Bluemont Avenue; First National Bank, Denison Avenue and Claflin Road; Union National Bank, 727 Poyntz Ave.; and Citizens Bank, 3049 Anderson Ave.

Coalition members have warned potential whistle users that a whistle won't guarantee they won't be attacked. Users should keep the whistle accessible at all times and should use the break-away chain provided to ensure that the attacker won't try to strangle the victim, they said.

Citizens are urged to listen for whistles being blown and call police if they see suspicious activity.

Insurance

the Grove City decision handed down by the Supreme Court in February 1984. The court made a literal interpretation of Title IX and said the regulation applies only to specific programs and activities which are federally funded.

"Legally, we could probably say that this (the student insurance program) is not any program or activity which receives any federal contribution or funding," Thompson said.

Although the change may be technically correct, she said, the question of discrimination against women arises.

"If it was discriminatory in 1976, is it not discriminatory now?" Thompson said.

For Students' Attorney Dianne Urban, there's no question.

"It is discriminatory, but it's legal," she said. "There's no law against it — that's the problem."

Urban said the policy change would just be another example of legal discrimination found in society.

"There are all kinds of legal discrimination out there," she said. "It happens left and right."

At a press conference earlier this month, K-State President Duane Acker said the University will continue to pursue non-discriminatory policy despite the Grove City decision. Charles Hein, director of communications, confirmed the University policy against discrimination.

"The institution of KSU will continue to be opposed to discrimination in any form or any program," he said.

Hein declined to discuss the proposed insurance policy change, saying "We (the President's office) are not really in a position to comment on it until we see what comes to the desk."

Ranger finds missing auto at bottom of marina cliff

Sometime between 4:30 p.m. April 16 and 6:15 a.m. April 17, someone stole a car from a sorority house near Sunset and Fairchild avenues. The car, a white 1978 Chevrolet Camaro with a Kansas personalized tag, was parked in the sorority parking lot.

At about 4:30 p.m., the victim was near her car when some friends came by and asked her to go with them to play softball. She agreed to play and placed her car keys under the front seat. The victim returned later that night and forgot about her keys being in the car. When she went to the parking lot the next morning to get into her car, she discovered it was missing.

About two hours after the car was discovered missing, a park ranger located the car, which had been driven off a cliff above the Tuttle Creek Reservoir Spillway Marina. The car had been parked on top of a hill, a rock placed on the accelerator pedal and allowed to drive itself off the cliff. The resulting damage was in excess of the estimated $4,000 value of the car.

It also appeared that the vehicle could have been involved in an accident prior to its being driven off the cliff.

Anyone having information about this or any other crime may call Crime Stoppers at 539-7777. Callers will remain anonymous and may qualify for cash rewards of up to $1,000.

The Collegian refused to publish this column. Because the writer, Lee White, is a member of the newspaper staff, he is forbidden to write letters to the editor. Therefore, it appears in full as a paid advertisement.

One fringe benefit of being in the news business that I've always enjoyed is receiving anonymous phone calls from people who disagree with what I've written. These calls bother some journalists, but I rather enjoy them. After all, where else can one learn so much about everything from his intellectual status to his parentage.

I just want to thank the person who called me shortly after 5 p.m. Thursday at my apartment to tell me that I'm a big, fat ignorant slob. Thank you, kind sir, you have solved my identity crisis and for that I am eternally grateful.

It may simply be a happy coincidence that an editorial I wrote on problems with K-State greek houses appeared in the same day's Collegian. Then again, maybe my editorial struck a responsive chord in the charming and polite heart of some greek. I don't know. This charitable gentleman didn't bother to identify himself. I suppose he thought his statement might make me mad and prompt another editorial.

Well, I just apply that old saying about sticks and stones in situations such as these. I have been called many other, less-complimentary names in my day. I also consider the source.

What really upset me about this call was that the man didn't seem to be concerned enough about whatever was on his mind to stay on the line and discuss it with me. He was obviously upset about something and I would have been happy to listen to his complaints. All I know about this person is that he thinks I eat too much, think too little and make messes.

Let's just suppose this man is a greek. That's fine with me. I have had the privilege of knowing several members of the greek system, including one who recently voiced her concern in a letter to the editor about our coverage of the Sigma Phi Epsilon little sisters program suspension.

Kathy Mueller and I discussed her letter after it appeared. I told her I thought she was wrong on some points, but that I realized why she believed the way she did. She explained some of the reasons for her stance. What resulted was a better understanding on both sides.

The difference between Mueller's method of expressing an opinion and the caller's complaint is one of great importance. Mueller chose to write a letter to the editor knowing full well she would have to face whatever criticism arose the next day. The caller, on the other hand, took the easy way out. He expressed his opinion, but only about the writer, not the issue. He didn't have to face anything the next morning, save for his conscience—if he has one.

There are some of you who think I'm anti-greek. Nothing can be further from the truth. What I am against is people who put themselves above others and this seems to be the prevailing attitude of some—not all—greeks.

While I may agree with what local officials are trying to do to combat neighborhood disturbances, I realize greeks aren't the only ones creating problems. But when as many community leaders as were at last Tuesday's meeting at the Riley County Police Department get together to discuss something it is newsworthy and deserves an editorial position.

By the same token, I regret that the Sig Eps had to face suspension of their little sisters organization. The Collegian, however, only reported what it was told and that wasn't much. Maybe if those involved would have taken the time to explain their side of the story, as they were given the opportunity to do, the story wouldn't have seemed unfair to them. But to kill the messenger for doing his job only makes the murder look like a fool.

I don't apologize for anything I have written about the greeks. To the best of my knowledge, all that was reported about the Sig Eps and greeks in general was true. Of course, editorials, while factual, are expressions of the editorial board's opinion, much like columns are the writer's opinion. It is not the purpose of a newspaper to achieve verisimilitude.

So, if there is anyone who would like to call me and complain about the stories, editorials and columns about the greek system, go ahead. But let's rise above the level of the anonymous caller and have a meaningful conversation about the newspaper's and the greeks' positions.

And as for you, the unknown caller, you are welcome to do the same. I won't even mention our earlier encounter. You obviously have my number. Maybe after a talk about your problems and mine, you will realize that the sloppy, the overweight and the ignorant are people, too.

Insurance change merits support

The Lafene Student Health Advisory Committee plans to propose a change in the K-State health insurance policy at the Student Senate meeting tonight. The proposal would make maternity coverage a rider rather than part of the basic plan.

Maternity coverage was first implemented in the insurance policy by Affirmative Action, when insurance premiums were considerably lower than they are today.

In the 1982-1983 school year, an insurance premium for a single student was $141.75 for the basic coverage, including maternity coverage. In 1983-1984, the same policy cost $337.

The board believes the reduction in the number of premiums sold this year, over 800, was a direct result of the increase in the cost of premium coverage.

The cost would still exceed this year's amount if the board changes the policy, but the price would be considerably less than if the current insurance coverage stays the same.

By changing the policy, $84,000 can be saved if the same number of policies bought this year, 1,460, are bought next year.

Single students would save $39 if maternity coverage was an option under the new plan. The policy with the new company would cost $390 instead of $429.

A student and spouse plan would cost $925 instead of $1,017.50, a savings of $92.50. A student, spouse and children plan would cost $1,290 without maternity care, as opposed to $1,419 with maternity care, a savings of $129.

The board believes a lower premium will create an incentive for students to buy K-State's health insurance. The board fears that many students are doing without coverage — a dangerous risk.

Senate and the student body should support such changes to once again provide adequate coverage at the lowest possible price for students who need and want health insurance.

David Bevins, for the editorial board

A miscarriage of justice

A strange case of justice has surfaced in Jersey City, N.J. A man convicted of manslaughter in the beating death of his wife has collected from her life insurance policy and now is seeking additional funds from his wife's job benefits.

According to the Associated Press, Thomas Cooper, 34, claims he needs the additional money to support his 6-year-old daughter. Since 1981, he has received $47,611.81 of the $98,000 policy.

But now the president of RFE Industries, a metals and chemicals company where Dorothy Cooper worked as a secretary until her death in 1978, is challenging Cooper's attempt to collect his wife's profit-sharing benefits.

"Here's a man who beats his wife to death and then benefits from it," Jack Leiner said. "That's the most absurd thing I've heard in my life."

I've heard in my life."

And indeed it is. Dorothy Cooper died from "multiple lacerations" of the liver. Cooper's attorney said his client is entitled to the money because the charge of manslaughter assumes no malice was present. Since when is wife abuse a well-intentioned, normal marital relation?

Cooper's mother, fortunately, is the legal guardian of the child, so who really supports the daughter? Does Cooper need this money to support her, as he claims?

Leiner said the money should be kept for the child, possibly in a trust fund — precisely the correct action. Judge Robert Tarleton is scheduled to rule on the profit-sharing money May 3. Let's hope this time justice will be properly administered.

Greeks aren't the only noisy living group

Editor,

Re: Lee White's editorial, "University must quiet greeks," in the April 19 Collegian.

Is the Collegian starting a new holiday called "Attack Greeks Week?" It seems full coverage is given to slam greeks when a few break laws, but the good things they do are usually glossed over and hidden on the less popular pages of the Collegian.

Why doesn't the Collegian give equal time to exposing the dirty laundry of residence hall and off-campus students? Maybe that's where the majority of the staff lives. Residence hall and off-campus students have as much mud to sling around as the greeks. I know — I've lived in both living groups. I am currently a member of the greek system and proud of it!

I'll admit there are some greeks (individuals) that do cause trouble, but there are individuals in every campus group who break laws. White's statement seems to indicate all off-campus students are subject to full enforcement of the law, which is not always true. Furthermore, I have never seen it happen!

I lived two years off campus, next to apartments and houses which had wild parties and extremely loud music, and some individuals did display rather crude behavior. The police may have told them several times to keep things quiet, but the students never listened and the law was never fully enforced. Many times the neighbors weren't brave enough to report the disturbance.

The hazing story put blame on the entire Sigma Phi Epsilon house and did very little for the greek system.

Again, it was a few individuals who made the violations, and if guilty, they should be reprimanded, not the entire fraternity!

This is not to say I believe any one living system is the best. They all have their strong and weak points, and there will always be a few individuals who make a bad impression for their living group. I just hope that all students will try to keep an open mind about all people.

I also hope the Collegian staff will in the future get and keep their facts straight, and not try to slam a whole group of people because of the activities of certain individuals. As well, can you try and give more equal time to all living groups (especially to off-campus students)?

Coalition challenges 'political' reasoning

Editor,

That the Coalition for Human Rights received no funding from Student Senate should not surprise anyone. As a former member of that august body, who happily was impeached, I had an opportunity to study the inner workings of senate firsthand, and I should like for someone to point out a more partisan political organization on campus.

In fact, senate very much resembles the governments of 18th century Great Britain — complete with its "prime ministry," its placemen, its consensual world view, its narrow self-interest and its casual disregard for the people. Unlike 18th century America, there is no articulate, politically-active counterelement to provide opposition.

Perhaps if the coalition were more establishment in appearance and orthodox in action, they might receive funding. However, they have the sheer audacity to have a minority person as their president and a small, but highly-motivated membership — among whom are numbered some of the best students on this campus — who refuse to accept the fiat of Kirk Porteous et. al.

What is at issue is not whether or not the coalition gets funding, for they will carry out their laudable activities regardless; what is clearly at issue is whether or not the K-State student body will allow their money to be allocated in such a "let them eat cake" atmosphere.

The dangerous precedent Porteous talks about is not funding "political" organizations, since it is obvious that they do. The precedent to be feared instead is the specter of a few students, for diverse reasons (the least of which is partisan politics), who challenge the tight little kingdom of privilege and self-interest that is senate.

That K-State is a second-rank university goes without saying. If this University is to escape falling back into being the provincial, vocational school it once was, organizations like the coalition are absolutely necessary, however much they disturb the comfortably numb atmosphere of K-State.

Student input needed on policy change

Editor,

Late Tuesday night, Student Senate learned of a question that will be proposed and decided on at the Thursday meeting: Should student health insurance be changed so that maternity coverage is offered only as a rider?

The Lafene Health Committee has decided that premiums are now so high students are forced to go without insurance. The reason for the high rates is the University policy requiring the offering of maternity benefits at no extra charge. The committee proposes maternity benefits as a rider.

Senators have less than 48 hours to decide on this issue. At the time of this writing I have no facts or figures to justify my vote one way or the other. I doubt that other senators will have time to seek extensive input on this issue.

All interested persons should call their senators before Thursday, or let their opinions be known in the open session at 6 p.m. Thursday.

Please don't let this slip through without student input.

Detroit resists use of auto air bags

WASHINGTON — As official Washington waits for a final decision on the future of air bags from Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole, General Motors has made a bold, last-ditch effort in favor of seat belts.

In a "first" for the industry, General Motors President M. James McDonald shrewdly announced last week that his company will pay $10,000 to the estate of anyone who dies, with his seat belt on, in a GM car purchased during the next year.

Unfortunately, General Motors' $10,000 payoff says less about its commitment to driver safety than its hostility to airbags. Transportation chief Dole, who has already installed air bags in her official car, has obviously made Detroit nervous.

General Motors' promotional gimmick relies on two simple facts: new-car owners have fewer accidents than old-car owners, and seat belt users account for only three percent of those who die in auto accidents every year.

Seat belt fans are also affluent, mostly female, health-conscious and — are you listening, GM? — owners of foreign cars and subcompacts.

Having limited its risk, GM still says it's only promoting greater seat belt use among all drivers. "We want to call attention to the fact that only 12 percent of all American drivers use seat belts," Robert Lund, a GM vice president for marketing, told us.

But that fact alone does little to bolster General Motors' claim that increased seat belt use offers the single best path to auto safety. Sure, seat belts save lives. And General Motors should be applauded for encouraging their use.

But it's been almost 20 years since U.S. automakers began installing seat belts in every new vehicle. And since then, seat belt use has actually decreased four percent.

Meanwhile, hundreds of public and private programs to encourage seat belt use have been tried time and again. The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration has spent $9 million promoting seat belts since 1981. American automakers are believed to have spent three times that amount.

Since the early 1970s, much of the delay in installing air bags has hinged on the argument that seat belt use can be increased by education, new incentives or laws. But there's no basis to support such an assertion. Even in Australia, Canada, and Sweden — all of which have mandatory seat belt laws — thousands still die every year in car accidents.

To be sure, air bags alone aren't the panacea to auto safety. Yet, they're involuntary safety devices. In a front-end collision, they deploy upon impact, cushion the driver and passenger, and quickly deflate. Since 60 percent of all automobile injuries result from front-end crashes, that means air bags would probably save a lot of lives.

To this day, however, Detroit hasn't even acknowledged the remote possibility that air bags might have saved the lives of 5,000 individuals who died in auto accidents while wearing seat belts last year — let alone the many thousands more who died because they didn't buckle up at all.

If General Motors is so convinced that seat belts are the answer to auto passenger safety, it might expand its life insurance offer to cover medical expenses as well. It might also make automatic seat belt restraints an option in all its new vehicles, perhaps offering consumers a $100 rebate for purchasing them. Such alternatives might prove to be a more genuine commitment to auto passenger safety.

War brews in Middle East

WASHINGTON — Washington, at least some of it, is having a nightmare — and not only at night. It's a nightmare about war, and not the one in Central America that some people think is coming, but one in the Middle East. That war will be between Syria and Israel. In the nightmare, everyone loses.

This war will not break out immediately, but a year or so down the road. It is then, analysts think, that Syria will have assimilated the vast amounts of military equipment the Soviet Union has provided. It is then that Syria will have trained its forces, completed its maneuvers and tested its weapons.

This war, predicted by some experts, is one for all to dread. Syria now has surface-to-surface missiles capable of reaching Israeli population centers, although they more likely will be used against military targets. In either event, Israel will have little choice but to attempt to destroy the missile batteries within Syria itself — something it was careful not to do during its Lebanon invasion of 1982. That action could trigger the Syrian-Soviet friendship treaty and bring the Russians into the war.

Of course, nothing — especially a war — is fated and, in any case, the prospects for this one may be overstated by Israel and her domestic friend to prod the United States into providing more military aid. And even in the Middle East, the darkest scenario can be brightened by events — anything from a new government in Israel to a new government in Syria.

But pessimism and realism go hand in hand here because both Israel and the United States have pursued similar policies and failed. Israel invaded Lebanon and remains mired there, taking casualties almost daily. As a result, it is afflicted with its own version of the Vietnam syndrome — a reluctance to use force unless absolutely necessary. For that reason, if for no other, a pre-emptive Israeli strike against Syria is thought to be out of the question.

As for the United States, it too gambled in Lebanon and lost. Instead of staying out of the civil war there, it plunged right in with the Marines. Instead of limiting the rhetoric to the task at hand — maintaining some sort of peace — it talked instead of the value of Lebanon to the free world. The president repeatedly promoted Lebanon as a country absolutely essential to American interests.

In one sense, Lebanon took on the importance accorded it. The more its value was exaggerated, the more our prestige was damaged when the Marines were finally withdrawn. What the United States lost in Lebanon was not territory, but face. When you draw a line, it does not matter that you chose poorly; what matters is if someone crosses it.

Now, the United States and Israel, having expended both lives and prestige in Lebanon with almost nothing to show for it, have to face a potentially far more serious situation in Syria. And Syria, emboldened by calling America's bluff once, might do it once more.

As for the Soviet Union, having suffered a humiliation once removed by the Israelis when they mauled the Syrians in 1982, it might be loath to experience a repeat. The use of force in Lebanon by both the Israelis and the United States has hardly made either country more secure. It has, instead, heightened the danger for both.

There is a lesson here for us in Central America. Once again, the president is raising the rhetorical stakes, citing an almost nonexistent danger to our own borders and attributing the region's problems to "a faraway totalitarian power" — the same power that was supposedly behind Lebanon's troubles.

And once again the president is relying on troops to do what diplomacy — and sound thinking — should do. In the end, we will either have to back down or plunge in.

So because both the United States and Israel employed force, supposedly to make the world safer, the world is now less safe than it used to be. The truth of that can be gleaned from conversations in Washington. People are talking about the next Mideast war — a nightmare made all the more likely because of the last Mideast war.

State's historical sites offer glimpses of past

(Editor's note: This is the last of eight articles about little-known historical sites in Kansas. "Hidden Places" is a program of University for Man and K-State's Division of Continuing Education.)

By ADAM ROME
Contributing Writer

The Ladies' Lounge in Hope, the Stone Man in Penokee, the Crow's Nest in Halstead, the Brown Grand Opera House in Concordia, the Mexican Fiesta in Chanute, the Cimarron National Grasslands in Elkhart, the Sumner School in Topeka — all are places where the curious can still see and touch and even taste a part of history.

But there are a thousand other historic sites in Kansas, just as fascinating, just as important, just as little-known.

In Lindsborg, for example, there is the Birger Sandzen gallery, a refreshing monument to a man who did much to bring art and beauty to Kansas, and a place where the wild and historic landscape is still almost overpoweringly present in painting and lithograph.

In Ellinwood there is a puzzling example of pioneer urban planning, a set of tunnels under the main street, and the curious remains of a few basement shops — a bit of wallpaper where a tired worker in 1881 calculated his wages, the holes in the wooden floor where a barber's chair was once nailed, a door with fancy carvings and a few hooks in the old harness maker's shop.

In Wamego, a few yards from what was once the third river crossing on the Oregon Trail, there is the Louis Vieux cemetery, a monument to the people who built as well as traveled the great highways of the West, and a poignantly vivid reminder of the now largely forgotten horrors of epidemic disease and childhood mortality.

In Cherokee County there is Big Brutus, abandoned now, but once the biggest steam shovel in the world, a stark reminder of the heavy industries that used to be the livelihood of Southeast Kansas.

In Cimarron and Dodge City there is a great ditch, the Soule Canal, a willful and extravagant project of a patent medicine king, a symbol today of the overweening urge to transform the land, to conquer nature.

And there are others, hanging trees and tabernacles, livery stables and dance halls and petroglyphs, courthouses and battle sites and iron crosses in cemeteries.

There are Chautauqua pavilions, railroad depots, round barns, silica mines and water towers. Ghost towns, trail ruts, trading posts and band shells. Restaurants, natural springs, grain elevators, mission buildings, jails and oil wells. Pueblos, newspaper offices, blacksmith shops, poor houses, tobacco drying barns, corrals and military roads. Stockades, college halls, libraries, mills, city treescapes, "Twin Mounds," bank buildings and aircraft factories.

Some of the "Hidden Places" in Kansas are mysteries — places that make one wonder.

Some are places taken for granted, a part still of everyday life, and yet places with an unexpected history.

Some are charming places, and some are melancholy things, places that remind us of otherwise forgotten tragedies or struggles or disappointments.

Some are reminders of the way people used to think about work or politics or God, reminders of ideas that may now strike us as strange or even perverse, but that once were commonplace.

Some are monuments to individuals — doctors, soldiers, ban-its, reformers, eccentrics, editors, prohibitionists and speculators.

Some are symbols of man's relation to the environment, landmarks or landscapes, natural and man-made.

Some are reminders of events, court cases and treaty signings and strikes.

And so the list of stories is as rich and varied as the list of sites. As one historian explained, history is a mansion with many rooms, all differently furnished, all differently enjoyed.

Despite the differences in detail, though, the "Hidden Places" of Kansas have much in common — all excite, all enrich, all enlighten. To explore a historic place is indeed almost to explore a foreign land — to see strange sites, to see strange happenings, to see strange people. It is a chance to live vicariously, to experience for a moment the pleasure or the pain of a first date at the opera, a kitchen-table surgery, a speech at a fiesta. And it is a chance to see oneself anew, to discover what is time-bound and what is eternal.

Open house plans ensure participation

By LYNN MEIER
Collegian Reporter

Plans are underway for the seventh annual All-University Open House, which is scheduled for March 29-30, 1985, Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for student affairs, said.

"The All-University Open House requires 13 months of planning. As plans for this year's open house were being finalized, planning for next year had already begun," Bosco said.

The deadline for applications for the overall steering committee was April 20. Selection of open house coordinators of individual colleges will be completed today.

Jane Miles, senior in accounting, has been selected as the overall coordinator of the All-University Open House for the second consecutive year, Bosco said.

He said long-term planning has helped make open house a successful means of informing prospective students and the general public on the opportunities K-State has to offer.

The 1985 open house will be the last part of a four-year long-range plan designed by an all-University coordinating council, Bosco said. Pre-scheduling has aided in stabilizing the open house program and insuring maximum attendance and participation.

In 1982, 46 percent of those who came to open house attended the event with family members. In 1983, 57 percent of those who came attended the event with family members. Attendance figures for 1984 have not yet been compiled.

The goals of the All-University

Open House, in addition to informing prospective students and their parents of the educational opportunities available at K-State, include informing the general public of the educational philosophy, programs, facilities and research at the University, and facilitating career exploration for current K-State students, Bosco said.

In 1982, 58 percent of students polled said attending open house made them more likely to attend K-State. Twenty-two percent had definitely decided to attend K-State prior to attending open house. There were no prospective K-State students who said they were less likely to attend the University after visiting campus on open house weekend.

In 1983, 47 percent of students polled said open house increased the possibility that they would attend

K-State. Fifty percent had decided to attend K-State prior to coming to open house. Three percent of those polled said they were less likely to attend K-State after attending open house.

Students polled stated that they attended open house to learn more about K-State, learn about possible majors at K-State, meet with faculty and advisers, see the campus, visit friends and see exhibits.

Bosco said the 1984 steering committee is deciding which parts of the program to retain and which to change through a series of debriefing sessions.

"The plans for open house 1985 will become progressively more concrete during the fall 1984 semester," Bosco said.

Supreme Court rejects custody ruling

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court, saying a white woman's child wrongly was taken from her because she married a black man, Wednesday barred courts from bowing to society's racial biases in child custody cases.

"The Constitution cannot control such prejudices but neither can it tolerate them," Chief Justice Warren E. Burger wrote for a unanimous court.

The decision overturned Florida court rulings in the case of Linda Sidoti Palmore, who lost custody of her daughter, Melanie, after she married Clarence Palmore, who is black.

A state judge granted custody of the little girl to her natural, white father, apparently because the judge feared the child would be subjected to society's scorn due to her mother's interracial marriage.

Burger acknowledged that concern for the child's best interests was proper, but he said trying to protect the child from the possibility of racial prejudice can play no role in custody proceedings.

"Private biases may be outside the reach of the law, but the law cannot, directly or indirectly, give them effect," he said.

Conceding that it "would ignore reality" to suggest that racial prejudice does not exist, Burger said, "there is a risk that a child living with a step-parent of a different race may be subject to a variety of pressures and stresses not present if the child were living with parents of the same racial or ethnic origin."

But he said the real question "is whether the reality of private biases and the possible injury they might inflict are permissible considerations for removal of an infant child from the custody of its natural mother."

"We have little difficulty concluding that they are not," Burger wrote in an unusually brief, five-page opinion.

Palmore, a Seffner, Fla., resident, lost custody of her daughter, now six years old, in 1982 after she married her current husband.

Palmore had been awarded custody of Melanie when she divorced Anthony J. Sidoti, who is white, in Florida in 1980.

But two years later Sidoti, an air conditioning installer now living in Bryan, Texas, told state Judge Morison Buck in Tampa, Fla., that circumstances had changed in the mother's situation — namely, the mother was involved with, and then married, a black man.

Buck awarded custody to Sidoti, and the decision later was upheld by a Florida appeals court.

In Wednesday's decision, Burger

said, "It is clear that the outcome would have been different had (Palmore) married a Caucasian male of similar respectability."

Burger's opinion stopped short of ordering Melanie's return to her mother's custody. The legal battle between Palmore and her former husband likely will return to Buck's court before its outcome is known.

In his decision, Buck had mentioned other factors contributing to Sidoti's request for custody. Sidoti now may try to convince Buck that he deserves custody based on those other reasons.

Diggs tries to bury past, start over

LANSING, Mich. — Former U.S. Rep. Charles Diggs, who quit Congress after he was convicted of fraud, is trying to regain his right to work as a funeral director in his home state.

The Michigan Board of Examiners in Mortuary Science on Tuesday authorized a hearing on the Detroit Democrat's application for a new license. He is licensed as a mortician in Maryland and Ohio, but his Michigan privileges were revoked in 1982.

Diggs, 61, served 10 months in a federal prison following his conviction in 1978 on 11 counts of mail fraud and 18 counts of falsifying the payroll of his congressional staff. Under Michigan law, state-licensed professionals can lose their standing for "lack of good moral character."

The Michigan Department of Licensing and Regulation in January denied Diggs' application for a new license, and he has appealed the denial.

Diggs, whose family operated one of Detroit's largest funeral homes, served 12 terms in Congress, winning re-election for the last time after his conviction. He resigned in 1980.

French actress' ailment not serious

HOUSTON — French actress Leslie Caron, hospitalized since she collapsed backstage before a matinee performance of "On Your Toes," is suffering from a debilitating, but not life-threatening, ailment, says a spokeswoman for the national touring company.

Caron, 52, was admitted to St. Luke's Episcopal Hospital on Sunday. Hospital officials refused to release information about Caron's condition at the request of her family.

However, Marilyn Levine, a representative for the national tour in New York, said Tuesday that doctors were still trying to diagnose the problem.

"She was weak and losing weight," Levine said.

Caron's ailment is "not life-threatening, but it's debilitating and dehydrating," she said. "If you've been to Europe or Mexico and gotten sick, you know what it's like. Sometimes it's the water you drink."

Caron performed Saturday night but fainted backstage before Sunday's matinee performance. An understudy took her place in the final two performances. The show opened without her in Dallas on Tuesday night.

FBI seeks one more in robbery

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — One man has been arrested and a second man is being sought in connection with the armed robbery March 30 of a Kansas City, Kan., credit union, the FBI reported Wednesday.

Michael D. Hatcher, 27, was arrested at a residence Tuesday on a complaint filed April 12 charging him with the holdup of the Challenger K.C. Credit Union. He was being held under a $50,000 bond in the Wyandotte County Jail. Authorities have not disclosed the amount of money taken in the robbery.

Robert B. Davenport, who is in charge of the Kansas City FBI office, said Michael E. McCarthy, 29, who escaped from federal custody at a halfway house in Kansas City earlier this month, also is charged with the armed robbery. He has not been arrested.

Federal affidavits on file in the case said both men had been convicted in connection with the 1979 holdup of a United Missouri Bank in Independence, Mo.

WW II allies to reunite at beach for D-day anniversary celebration

By The Associated Press

LONDON — With plenty of nostalgia and a hint of pique at the French, Britain is preparing to celebrate this year's 40th anniversary of the D-day landings by dropping its paratroopers, along with Americans, over Normandy's Utah Beach.

That's where the American, French and British heads of state will be waiting at the focal point of French-organized ceremonies on the June 6 anniversary of the Allied invasion which marked the beginning of the final defeat of Hitler's Nazi Germany.

Utah, like Omaha, is a beach where American forces went ashore on France's Normandy coast. British and Canadian troops assaulted three others, code-named Gold, Juno and Sword, in the final push against the Germans in World War II.

"The selection of Utah Beach may be surprising to the British," said Lt. Col. John Arthur, organizer of the British Defense Ministry's participation in the celebrations.

"However, this is a French decision and they feel it's the most suitable beach on which they can do what they want," Arthur said, outlining the Defense Ministry's plans at a news conference at London's Imperial War Museum.

What French President Francois Mitterrand has done is to invite — and they're going — Britain's Queen Elizabeth II and U.S. President Ronald Reagan to Utah Beach for the anniversary of the greatest amphibious operation in history.

Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau is expected to be there too for the afternoon ceremony, along with veterans, sightseers and a huge press corps trampling the sand dunes.

Arthur chose his words carefully, evidently keen to avoid marring the occasion by hints of old rivalries about who won the war.

But British official sources hinted strongly that the queen may attend another ceremony on a "British" beach in the morning.

Britain's 3,000-strong Normandy Veterans' Association is pulling no punches about its feelings at celebrating the anniversary on Utah, where American forces commanded by Gen. Omar Bradley struggled ashore under fearsome pounding from German batteries.

"The truth is the Americans have always treated the British part in Normandy as a sideshow," Eric Bulman, head of the veterans' association was quoted as saying in a recent interview with London's Mail on Sunday newspaper.

As a private in the Royal Irish Hussars, a British regiment, Bulman was at Normandy — one of 176,500 men, including 70,500 Americans and 83,100 British and Canadians, who took part in the assault.

On the first day, 2,500 of them were killed and 8,000 wounded.

Also setting up celebrations — as he does annually — is a Normandy mayor, Raymond Triboulet, designated by France's late President Charles de Gaulle to run each anniversary as head of the Normandy Landings Committee.

The Defense Ministry's Arthur said the British have taken part in Triboulet's celebrations every year.

"We didn't know about the French government's plans until last autumn," said Arthur.

"But anyway we wanted to help in putting on a bigger show. This may be the last major opportunity for many veterans to make the pilgrimage because of their advancing years."

The Defense Ministry program includes a June 5 drop at Ranville by Britain's 2nd parachute regiment, known as the "Red Devils" after their caps. Ranville is the site of graves of men slain from throughout the Commonwealth, the association of Britain and its former colonies.

During the main French-organized ceremony, the Red Devils will drop with American paratroopers, and a British guided missile destroyer, HMS Fife, will join warships from other allied nations off the coast. A light infantry company will parade with units from the other Allied armies.

"We're not organizing anything, just helping," said Arthur, "and we hope many British veterans will be there."

But Valmai Holt, tour organizer for another veterans' association, the Royal British Legion, returned from Normandy this month complaining the anniversary is shaping up as "chaotic" because of Mitterrand turning it into a state occasion.

"That (Utah) is an anathema to the British veterans who want ceremonies on their own beaches."

Congressmen seek approval of nuclear freeze resolution

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Backers of a U.S.-Soviet freeze on nuclear weapons, after failing two years in a row to pass a non-binding congressional resolution on the issue, introduced a stronger measure Wednesday and conceded that its chances are probably even slimmer.

The new bill calls upon the president to propose to the Soviet Union a moratorium on the testing and deployment of new nuclear missiles and anti-satellite weapons and on the testing of nuclear warheads.

If the Soviets were willing but the president did not take such an initiative, funds for such testing and deployment would be suspended after 90 days.

"We don't make any promises other than that we are going to mobilize the grass roots of the country," Rep. Edward J. Markey, D-Mass., said at a news conference.

The original freeze resolution, designed to freeze nuclear arsenals of the two superpowers at existing levels, fell two votes short of passing the Democratically controlled House in 1982, and passed 278-149 last year. It failed to make it through the Republican-controlled Senate either year.

Rep. Jim Leach, R-Iowa, who joined Markey as a prime sponsor of the new bill, said there were six Republicans among its 82 co-sponsors and predicted it would get "significant Republican support" although perhaps slightly less than the freeze resolution did.

The new measure is more specific than the freeze because it focuses on specific weapons, such as the MX missile, rather than simply calling for a mutual and verifiable freeze of all nuclear weapons.

It is more stringent because, unlike the freeze resolution, it provides for a cutoff of funds.

"The freeze campaign has raised the stakes," said Randall Kehler, national coordinator of the Nuclear Weapons Freeze Campaign, dubbing the new measure "quick freeze."

Kehler said freeze supporters, who have formed a political action committee to back candidates in this year's elections, would "take into account a candidate's position on the quick freeze."

Chaplain Morrison, lobbyist for the Nuclear Weapons Freeze Campaign, said the legislation was drafted after freeze leaders decided that something stronger than a "request to the president" was needed.

"The freeze resolution is definitely on the back burner," Morrison said. "I don't know that I would call it dead, but it is not at this time the vehicle we feel is appropriate to end the nuclear arms race."

Higher food prices incite islanders; sporadic rioting causes 39 deaths

By The Associated Press

SANTO DOMINGO, Dominican Republic — Security forces took a firm grip on this island capital Wednesday after two days of rioting over food price increases. But two more people were killed in sporadic violence, bringing the three-day death toll to 39.

Hundreds of people were injured in the riots and police said an estimated 1,000 arrests were made.

Heavily armed police and troops patrolled the streets Wednesday and military helicopters flew above the city. Many Dominicans returned to work and city workers removed the debris of rioting — barricades, burned out vehicles, broken glass and smoldering tires.

"It's definitely much quieter today," said a U.S. Embassy staff member, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The police reported five deaths Monday, including a rookie officer, as demonstrations against food price increases turned into riots.

Police sources said 29 people were killed or fatally injured in four cities Tuesday, the bloodiest day since the 1965 civil war in this Caribbean nation, which shares the island of Hispaniola with Haiti.

The sources said a man and a woman were killed in the capital when soldiers opened fire on violent crowds Wednesday morning, and three people died of wounds suffered earlier.

Some news media here estimated as many as 54 people had been killed, but reports of deaths in rural provinces were not confirmed.

Many looted stores remained closed as employees cleaned up and public transportation was scarce. At least six buses were burned Monday and Tuesday by rioters in the capital.

The military announced its "unrestricted support and full obedience" to President Salvador Jorge Blanco, whose announcement of price increases last week spurred the rioting.

Police figures said there were 22 dead in Santo Domingo, 11 in Santiago — including a young girl shot accidentally by soldiers as she stood in front of her home, five in San Francisco de Macoris, and one in San Cristobal.

Casualty reports indicated most victims were shot by police and soldiers trying to quell the rioting and looting.

Army Lt. Gen. Ramiro Matos Gonzalez called the riots "politically inspired." A leader of the ruling Social Democratic Party, Jose Francisco Pena Gomez, charged that opposition parties of the left and right had united "against law and democracy" in an effort to bring down the elected government.

But diplomatic sources said the scope of participation, particularly in slum areas, showed that the rioting was a reaction to the price increases, which affected such basic foodstuffs as powdered milk, flour and cooking oil, in some cases doubling prices. The diplomatic sources spoke on the condition that they not be named.

Olathe may opt to replace KP&L

By The Associated Press

OLATHE — Olathe city officials say they may want to force the Kansas City Power & Light Co. out of town rather than to pay sharply higher rates when the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant begins operation next year.

But the city's attorney told a city commission meeting on Tuesday that the idea of replacing KCP&L with a proposed municipal power utility might be easier said than done.

City Attorney Tom Glinstra said the powers of eminent domain normally were applied to condemnation of land and not a public utility. Olathe might have a tough time arguing otherwise in court, he said.

Glinstra studied the feasibility of the city forming its own utility after Commissioner Larry Huckleberry, concerned about anticipated rate increases to cover the cost of Wolf Creek, offered the proposal last month.

The commission could approve an ordinance invoking the powers of eminent domain, which involves the right of a government to authorize the taking of private property for public use. No action on the matter was taken Tuesday.

City Manager Lee Broadbeck said city officials should consult the Kansas Corporation Commission before meeting with KCP&L officials to discuss the sale. A 20-year cost projection for the proposed municipal utility also would be needed, Broadbeck said.

Doctors argue right to non-treatment

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Many chronically ill patients who are rescued from coronary arrest in the hospital wish they had been allowed to die, and doctors should talk frankly to them about how these emergencies will be handled, a study concludes.

The research found that physicians are reluctant to question patients about what they want done if their hearts stop beating. Often they feel they know the patients' wishes, but frequently they are wrong.

At a large Boston hospital, a third of the patients resuscitated in one year said later they would rather have died and did not want to be revived again.

"Open discussion and not good-intentioned guessing about people's desires is imperative," said Dr. Susanna E. Bedell, who directed the study

Many patients didn't want CPR

The controversy centers on the conflict between doctors who want to do everything they can to prolong life and chronically ill patients who would rather give up and die quickly.

Even though patients have a right to refuse treatment, many doctors believe that no rational person would turn down all that medical technology can offer. Others say patients should not be asked to face such a decision.

At issue is cardiopulmonary resuscitation, or CPR, the practice of stimulating the heart to resume beating after it has stopped.

"Our study suggests that many patients may know what they want and welcome the chance to make their own contribution to this difficult debate," the researchers wrote.

"Their reasons (for opposing resuscitation) varied but were focused primarily on their discontent with a lifestyle limited by chronic illness and their fear of further suffering at the time of arrest and resuscitation," they wrote.

The study by Bedell and Dr. Thomas L. DeBanco surveyed all the cases in which patients were resuscitated at Beth Israel Hospital in Boston during 1981. The results were published in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine.

Of the 24 mentally competent patients who survived, eight said that they had not wanted CPR and would not want it again.

Bedell said researchers have continued to survey survivors since 1981 and the ratio of one in three who oppose resuscitation has held up.

However, in the study, only one of the 16 doctors who took care of the eight people suspected that they felt this way.

They found that in all, 19 percent of the patients who were resuscitated had been asked beforehand whether they would want to be. Yet, 68 percent of the physicians thought that they knew what their patients would have preferred.

In an accompanying editorial, Dr. Marcia Angell, the journal's deputy editor, said that even if patients understand the possibility of coronary arrest, they may be afraid they'll offend their doctors by asking such questions.

"Since patients naturally feel very dependent on the good will of their physicians," she wrote, "they are loath to risk losing it."

Panel approves bill to increase juco aid

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Senate Ways and Means Committee endorsed a proposal Wednesday to increase state aid to the state's 19 community colleges and Washburn University by $2, to $25 per credit hour next year.

The committee agreed not to increase out-district aid, which is $22 per credit hour. Aid to Washburn University's law school would remain $26 per credit hour.

The bill now goes to the Senate floor for debate and action.

State aid per credit hour now is $23. Gov. John Carlin recommended that aid be increased to $23.50.

The House had voted to increase state aid to $24 per credit hour and out-district aid to $24. The Senate committee's action, which was proposed by President Ross Doyen, R-Concordia, would increase state aid to the colleges and Washburn University by $1.46 million more than Carlin recommended.

Sen. Ron Hein, R-Topeka, said he objected to the proposal but voted for it. He said it wasn't enough.

"This proposal may parallel what we've done for the regents institutions this year, but we didn't have any increase last year," Hein said.

The Legislature increased the budgets for other operating expenses at universities under the Kansas Board of Regents by 7 percent.

Legislative staff estimated that increasing Washburn University's budget by 7 percent would require an increase in state aid to $25.10 per credit hour.

Committee endorses hike in state pay

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The House budget committee voted Wednesday to introduce and send to the House floor for debate a Republican proposal to increase state employees' salaries next year by $27 million and provide an additional $12 million for merit bonuses.

The House Ways and Means Committee also endorsed two bills aimed at relieving prison overcrowding.

The pay bill provides $27 million to give the state's 37,000 workers a 5 percent cost-of-living increase, as recommended by Gov. John Carlin.

The bill also contains an extra $12 million to be used for bonuses of 1 to 3 percent for state employees who receive standard, above-standard or outstanding evaluations from their supervisors. Carlin opposes that idea because he says 98.4 percent of all workers would qualify.

The merit bonus would not be included in the state employees' salary base and so would not be used to compute salary increases in future years.

Rep. Bill Buntin, R-Topeka, the committee chairman, said the merit bonus would be paid sometime between

Dec. 1, 1984 and Jan. 31, 1985. He called it the state's way of saying "Merry Christmas and thanks."

Buntin worked with Rep. David Miller, R-Eudora, and Sens. Paul Hess, R-Wichita, and Ron Hein, R-Topeka, to develop the proposal last week.

Carlin had recommended that each state employee receive a flat $204 payment in addition to the 5 percent increase. The Democratic governor wanted the entire increase added to the employee salary base. His plan would cost the state $33.6 million.

The GOP proposal was approved on a voice vote, despite objections from some Democrats on the committee.

"Now is not the time to go into a bonus-type pay plan," said Rep. Don Mainey, D-Topeka. "I will be offering an amendment on the floor to put the money we are discussing here into the cost-of-living and the base."

The committee also endorsed a proposal by Rep. Ed Rolfs, R-Junction City, to recommend a numerically based evaluation system be developed to replace the current system, which rates employees as below-standard, standard, above-standard and outstanding.

Another provision of the pay bill would increase the annual salaries for the chief justice of the Kansas Supreme Court from $55,646 to $58,000 and the associate justices from $52,864 to $56,500. It also would increase the annual salaries for the chief judge of the Kansas Court of Appeals from $51,752 to $54,752 and associate judges from $50,639 to $53,639.

The committee approved the proposal for capital improvements at state prisons and the sentencing bill at the urging of the special House Committee on Corrections.

The first bill provides $325,000 this year to plan a new 300-bed prison and to study the feasibility of converting an existing state hospital to a prison facility.

It embodies Carlin's request for $633,600 over two years to renovate prison facilities to provide 192 additional beds at the Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing and the Kansas State Industrial Reformatory at Hutchinson.

The Senate-passed sentencing bill would reduce the minimum sentences for less serious, non-violent crimes involving property. It repeals provisions of a stiffer sentencing law passed by the Legislature in 1982.

The bill reduces to one year the minimum sentences for class D and E felonies. Current minimum sentences for class D felonies is two to three years and for class E felonies is one to two years.

It also allows a judge to put on probation any person convicted of a class E felony for the first time.

Acting on the advice of the special panel, the budget committee amended the bill to require sentencing judges to review the cases of all class D and E felons in prison who were sentenced under the stiffer sentencing law.

After the review, the judges could reduce those inmates' minimum sentences to bring them into line with the shorter proposed sentences.

It also approved an amendment by Rolfs to raise the crime of child abuse from a class E to a class D felony.

"Very few crimes that are classified Class E felonies are crimes against people," Rolfs said. "This is one of the worst crimes against people I can think of."

Crew team to launch new boat

The K-State crew teams will compete at the Midwest Regatta at the University of Wisconsin on Saturday. K-State will send five boats to the event, including the undefeated men's varsity heavyweight four.

Other entries representing K-State include the men's varsity lightweight four, the varsity women's four and men's and women's novice eight crews.

"I don't know if it'll hurt (a week off from competition), but it sure won't help," said K-State Crew Coach Pete Hamma. "I think all of them have a good shot at the finals, and the heavyweight four should place in the top three."

Hamma said host team Wisconsin and possibly the University of Purdue are the teams to beat. He said Wisconsin is always tough, especially at home, but Purdue has beaten them in a few men's events and has never lost a race in the women's novice eight.

The eight-man teams at K-State have been racing in a new shell since the Big Eight Championships on April 14, and it represents a "giant step forward" for the program, Hamma said.

"It's a technological step for us. Carbon shells can take 15-20 seconds off your times, and that can make the difference in a lot of races," Hamma said.

The new shell is a 1981 Merit Robinson carbon shell built for the United States Olympic team. It was originally valued at more than $11,000, but was purchased from the manufacturer for $5,500. Hamma said that fully rigged, the new shell weighs 180 pounds compared to the 280-300 pounds of the older wooden shells.

The shell was brought to K-State from the University of Wisconsin, where it had been stored for the past two years.

This is the first new shell at K-State in 10 years, Don Rose, novice coach, said. Rose founded the K-State rowing program 20 years ago.

"We would have liked a new Pocock C-shell, but the Robinson was good enough for the Olympics and should be good enough for us," Rose said.

Fund-raising efforts are continuing to pay for the shell, Hamma said.

OSU netters win tourney

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Renata Marcinkowska of Oklahoma State defeated Allyson Ingram of Oklahoma, 6-1, 6-3, Wednesday afternoon as all six of the Cowgirls' singles players captured Big Eight Conference women's tennis tournament titles.

Oklahoma State dominated the tournament, clinching its fourth straight title after the first day of competition. The Cowgirls finished with 111 points to second-place Oklahoma's 84. Kansas had 75 points, Nebraska, 69, Iowa State, 42, Colorado, 38, and Kansas State, 22.

Marcinkowska was joined in the champion's circle by her teammates, Mary Boudreaux, the No. 2 player; Robyn Lamb, No. 3; Rhona Howett, No. 4; Stacy Swanson, No. 5; and Sue Mowery, No. 6.

Rugby Club places 3rd at national tournament

The K-State Rugby Club captured third place at the national rugby playoffs last weekend. Its finish may place it among the top 12 teams in the nation.

The playoffs were scheduled to be held Saturday at Boulder, Colo., but snow forced the playoffs to Pueblo, Colo., for Sunday action.

K-State handed Oklahoma State University a 14-0 defeat in the first-round game.

Bill Knopick scored the first try, but failed on the extra-point attempt. Kelly Cohan followed with another try, but once again Knopick missed the kick. Knopick successfully made his third extra-point kick of the game, however, following a try by Brian Riedel.

K-State then fell to the University of Colorado in a tough defensive game, 7-0.

The Buffaloes then beat the U.S. Air Force Academy, 25-4, to advance to the final four in Monterey, Calif.

Four members of the K-State squad made the western collegiate representative team. They were Bill Sexton, Danny Blea, Kelly Cohan and Mike Powers.

Knight faces tough job

Bobby Knight has the toughest job around. As coach of the 1984 U.S. Olympic basketball team, the University of Indiana coach, along with a committee of coaches, must pick the nation's 12 best players out of a pool of talent that rates as the top in the world.

However, Knight has faced this pressure before. As coach of the 1979 Pan American team, he cut such players as Mark Aguirre, Darrell Griffith, Buck Williams, Kelly Tripuka and Andrew Toney, all proven National Basketball Association caliber players. But with the team he assembled, Knight won the gold medal in Puerto Rico, even if he didn't make many friends along the way.

Knight plans to pick players for the Olympic team that best suit his style of coaching — a player that makes few mental errors on the court and gives 100 percent to win. It takes more than talent to be a Knight player, mental toughness also is a key factor.

Obviously, this philosophy has worked for Knight so far. In his 13 years at Indiana, the Hoosiers have won two national championships and compiled a 296-93 record.

Knight is considered by many to be the best collegiate coach in the nation. Still, it's a hard pill to swallow when a top player is sent packing after being told he isn't up to Olympic standards.

For some players, being cut had to be especially hard to take.

Take the case of Antoine Carr, the former Wichita State University standout who was among the casualties of the cuts made Monday. The 6-foot-9 forward spent the last season playing in Italy and, because of this foreign experience, was seen to have an advantage over many of the players at the tryout.

Carr reportedly was making the effort to catch Knight's attention. According to some players in Bloomington, Carr was playing like a man possessed, diving for loose balls and playing tough defense on people like University of Oklahoma standout Waymon Tisdale.

TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

Carr showcased his talents well at the scrimmages held Saturday and Sunday. On the first day, Carr led his team with 12 points and grabbed a game-high nine rebounds. Sunday he added six points in a game dominated by balanced scoring.

Yet when the names were announced for those who made the latest cuts, Carr's name was absent. He joined such stars as Michael Cage of San Diego State University, Michael Young of the University of Houston, Kenny Fields of the University of California at Los Angeles, Jim Master of the University of Kentucky and Roosevelt Chapman of the University of Dayton, that had been snubbed by Knight earlier.

So goes the tough world of Olympic basketball tryouts.

While it's hard to second-guess a coach of Knight's reputation, cutting such talent as these players is questionable.

There are players who are automatic Olympic squad selections. It's accepted that for Patrick Ewing of Georgetown University, OU's Tisdale and the University of North Carolina's tandem of Sam Perkins and Michael Jordan, the tryouts are a mere formality. But by adding Carr and the 6-foot-9 Cage, the U.S. front line would have added two very strong, physical players — just what is needed for the international game.

At the guard spot, along with Jordan — the consensus college player of the year — players such as Lancaster Gordon of the University of Louisville, Leon Wood of the University of California at Fullerton and swingman Chris Mullin of St. Johns University would be solid additions.

At forward, 6-foot-6, 285-pound Charles Barkley has amazed onlookers with his versatility. Nicknamed "Boy Gorge" at Auburn University, Barkley has the weight to mix it up inside and the speed and agility to handle the ball off a pressing defense.

Another big addition inside would be Joe Kline, the University of Arkansas's 6-foot-11 hulk. With Kline to spell the "Beast from the East" Ewing inside, the U.S. would have a devastating one-two power punch.

Those are the players I think would best represent the U.S. in Los Angeles this summer. While Carr and Cage will have to buy tickets to watch the competition, for the other players the cuts have yet to strike.

One thing is sure. Gone are the days when the U.S. dominated the Olympic basketball scene. Even with the combination of Knight, Ewing, Jordan and Tisdale, the Yugoslavians, Czechs and Russians all will field teams strong enough to challenge in 1984. The red, white and blue will have to do more than show up to handle the gold.

Olympic meeting resolves several issues for Soviets

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — The Soviet news agency Tass admitted Wednesday that "several fundamental issues were resolved" at a special meeting of United States and Soviet Olympic Committee officials concerning the 1984 Summer Games at Los Angeles.

In a report from Lausanne, Switzerland, Tass said that Peter Ueberroth, president of the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee, and Soviet Olympic Committee chairman Marat Gramov had discussed Soviet allegations of U.S. Olympic Charter violations during a special meeting Tuesday.

"Several fundamental issues were resolved, specifically related to the visa-free entry to the United States by Games' participants ... and accredited journalists to all competition and training sites, accommodations, etc. ... during the period of the Games and of their preparation, and observance of international regulations with regard to the boats anchored in the port of Los Angeles," Tass said.

The statement was a reversal of past Soviet demands that the LAOOC ensure the security of Soviet athletes, and Kremlin complaints that U.S. government officials were too involved in Olympic preparations.

Job outlook to improve for graduates

By The College Press Service

This spring's college graduates can look forward to a job market that is "very improved" compared to last year's gloomy employment scene, placement experts report, but it's still nowhere near the booming market of the late seventies and early eighties.

"There's a decided turnaround in the market, and I think it's going to continue for awhile," said Victor Lindquist, placement director at Northwestern University and author of the Endicott Report on nationwide employment trends for college grads.

"It's kind of nice after going through two successive years of tailing activity to see job offers coming back in," he said.

Indeed, the number of job offers made to the nearly one million students who will graduate with bachelor's degrees this spring is up about 33 percent nationally, said Linda Pengilly of the College Placement Council.

"It's a big improvement over last year," she said.

"Much, much better than 1983," concurred Jack Shingleton, placement chief at Michigan State University and director of another nationwide job market study.

"We're seeing more employers coming in to interview, hiring quotas are up for all companies about 5 percent and more offers are being made," he said.

General Motors' hiring needs "are really up for graduates, and we're looking primarily for engineering and computer science majors," said Walt Rolm, GM's college recruitment director.

Likewise, International Business Machines Corp. will hire more grads than last year, said spokesman Les Sabor.

To fill the company's 10,000 openings this year, IBM recruiters are visiting more than 350 campuses in search of graduates with technical skills, business majors and even some liberal arts graduates, he said.

American Telegraph and Telephone, in the wake of its recent divestiture, will hire "about the same" number of graduates as last year, and expects to increase its job openings dramatically by 1985, officials there said.

The change will be welcomed. "Last year's job market was the worst in recent history," Pengilly said. "Offers and salaries hit rock bottom."

Following the record-breaking markets of the late seventies, when many graduates were getting multiple job offers and starting salaries were increasing at 9 to 13 percent a year, in the last two years employers have cancelled campus interviews, cut back on the number of job offers, and gave little, if any, increases in starting salaries, she said.

"Now the 1984 graduate has a much more optimistic market to go into," Pengilly said. "Things are still restrained, but there's a subdued optimism that things will keep improving."

The economic upturn, coupled with the fact that many employers have deferred new hirings for the last two years, means there are more openings for this year's job seekers, Shingleton said.

The starting salaries being offered to this spring's grads, however, aren't improving much. Salary offers average 1 to 4 percent over last year's stagnated levels, experts said.

Even for popular majors like engineering and computer science, salary increases are only 2 or 3 percent, according to Pat Sheridan, executive director for the Engineering Manpower Commission.

"There may be a turnaround, but salary increases are nowhere near what we saw in earlier years," he said. "In fact, they're no better than what we were seeing last year."

"It's still an employers' market and the employers realize it," Pengilly said. "A lot of employers are telling us they're finding a much more competitive attitude among graduates, and they're coming to campuses with full interview schedules."

Another reason for the virtual freeze on salary increases is that employers aren't anxious to repeat the sins of several years ago, when many graduates got starting salaries that often were higher than salaries paid to other employees.

"That so-called 'internal salary compression' hurt many employers and caused a lot of dissatisfaction among their established employees," Pengilly said. "Employers are really working to hold the line. Unless the economy takes a significant and unexpected upswing or the money supply tightens, we don't expect starting salaries to change much."

Engineering majors are still the choice graduates in this year's market, enjoying $24,000 to $34,000 starting salaries, Pengilly said.

Of the more than 74,000 four-year engineering graduates this year, the electrical engineering majors remain the crown princes in terms of demand and starting salaries, Sheridan said, followed by mechanical, civil and chemical engineers.

Computer science and business majors also continue to be in strong demand and are commanding $20,000-plus salaries, Lindquist said.

And liberal arts and humanities majors continue to struggle along with the fewest job offers and lowest starting salaries.

Starting wages for them are averaging a pale $16,000, Pengilly said, actually a 3 percent decrease from last year salary offers.

"I don't think opportunities are diminishing for liberal arts graduates," she said, "but for the last few years, as we were in a recession, many employers were cutting costs by hiring liberal arts people to do some of the jobs previously held by technical majors."

Now, with the improved economy and a ready supply of eager technical graduates, those employers are once again bypassing liberal arts majors.

Indeed, much of the recent talk about companies hiring more liberal arts graduates "is nothing but talk," Shingleton said.

"I've sat and listened to many a chairman of the board talk about the need for bringing liberal arts people into the company," he said. "But invariably, their corporate recruiters come back to campus and hire nothing but engineers and computer science majors. It's all a lot of talk at the top without any follow through."

"But I'm still really surprised at the number of firms looking for students who have well-rounded educations, who've done well in school, have work experience and are involved in extracurricular activities," Lindquist said.

Two-year graduates with specialized vocational degrees shouldn't have any problem finding a starting job, said Maureen Kennedy, placement director at Penn Valley Community College in Kansas City, Mo.

But a general, two-year Associate of Arts degree is virtually worthless, except to take to a four-year school, she said.

Consider repairs, features before buying telephone

(Editor's note: This is the third of a series of articles written by members of the K-State Consumer Relations Board to educate readers on topics of consumer interest as part of National Consumer Week this week.)

By SHARON CHALKER
Contributing Writer

Since the divestiture of the American Telephone and Telegraph Co., consumers now have the option of owning their own telephone or continuing to rent it from AT&T.

There are certain items to consider when making the decision to buy a telephone. If you plan to purchase your current telephone, its condition and the number of years it has been used should be considered. You should have the condition of the telephone's parts checked before making a purchase. Even if you buy your telephone, you should have a spare one in case a failure occurs.

There are several factors to consider when purchasing a telephone:

Consider costs. New models are priced from less than $20 to more than $200. These telephones may be purchased at telephone centers, convenience stores and radio supply stores. Depending on the telephone and previous rental costs, the rent most people save can exceed the price of the telephone in six to 18 months.

Consider repairs. When consumers buy their own telephone, they become responsible for repairs and maintenance. They should consider where the telephone must be sent for repairs? If a telephone is rented, AT&T will provide this service.

Check warranties. Many stores provide warranties and repair services for their telephones. Telephones purchased at discount stores may not have these services.

Check the receiver. How would it feel during a long conversation? Does it sit on your shoulder comfortably?

Check the dial. Does it seem sturdy? What type of sounds do the buttons make when dialed? Some telephones dial the numbers with loud banging tones.

Check the process of hanging up. Is it easy to put the receiver in the correct position to hang up? Can you accidentally bump the hang-up button while talking?

Check the cords. Are the cords as long as your old telephone? Do they reach so you can talk comfortably?

Check the ring. What does it sound like? Some telephones give a series of beeps or chirping sounds rather than a ring.

Check the voice quality. To check this, make sure that the store will take the telephone back if it does not sound right to you. Take it home and call a friend. See how their voice sounds, and ask what you sound like. Some telephones distort or echo voices.

Check the features. Look for any special features of the telephone such as automatic redial or "mute" buttons that allow you to cut off your voice from the listener.

Maternity benefits cut from insurance plan

By KAREN BELLUS
Staff Writer

Maternity benefits are excluded from the general coverage in a student health insurance recommendation approved by Student Senate on Thursday night.

The Lafene Student Health Advisory Committee submitted a student health plan with two options. The first option provided health insurance without maternity coverage. Maternity coverage would be available at an additional cost. The second option included maternity benefits. The committee recommended the first option.

Senators questioned whether the recommended student health plan would be approved by K-State President Duane Acker because the plan might violate nondiscrimination measures outlined in Title IX.

The current student health insurance plan, which is offered by Trans-America Occidental Life, expires August 27, 1984. This policy offers automatic maternity coverage.

The plan approved by Senate was submitted by Keystone Insurance, which was the lowest bidder offering the student insurance.

The annual rates for health insurance without maternity coverage would be $390 for single students, $925 for student/spouse, $895 for student/children and $1,290 for student/spouse and children. A $400 rider may be included in the policy to include maternity coverage.

The rates for the Keystone insurance plan with maternity coverage included are 10 percent higher for all categories than with the coverage excluded. This would bring costs to $429 per year for a single student, $1,017 for student/spouse, $984 for student/children and $1,419 for student/spouse and children.

Those objecting to the committee's recommendation said the plan discriminates against women because it would affect only women.

"I feel this plan is very discriminatory. To have a policy that affects only one sex is clearly sex discriminatory," Caroline Peine, assistant dean for student development, said.

Lori Rock, arts and sciences senator, proposed an amendment to the health plan that would provide automatic maternity coverage. This was, in effect, the second option offered by the committee.

Senate discussed the proposed amendment extensively before voting against it. The consensus of senate was that the interests of the student body would be better served by adopting the health plan without maternity coverage. The advisory committee said approximately 5 to 8 percent of all students carrying the insurance used the maternity coverage this year.

Many senators expressed concern that the higher cost of the health plan with maternity coverage might prevent students from buying health insurance, and this group is larger than the group affected by maternity coverage.

"I think this plan is more of an economic issue than a discrimination one. We have been shown that no one has taken advantage of this (current maternity coverage), and that virtually no one has used it. On the other hand, I am very concerned about how many K-State students will be forced to take the risk of not being covered because the price was too high," Brian O'Neill, graduate senator, said.

In other business, the senate approved the senate Finance Committee's recommendation to tentatively allocate Student Publications its current rate of line-item funding for the next three years, which will allow it to receive $3 from the fees of each full-time student and $1 from part-time students. Student Publications had requested $3 for each full-time student and $2 for part-time students.

The senate also approved the committee's recommendation that the K-State Union receive a $12 allocation for each full-time student and $6 for part-time students, as requested by the Union.

Senate also was scheduled to discuss funding for Recreational Services and honorariums and reconsider the tentative allocations given to the International Coordinating Council and the Early Childhood Laboratory. These will be covered in an article in Monday's Collegian.

Hispanic festival emphasizes cultural heritage

Warm, sunny weather and a free outdoor concert combined together Thursday to provide more than 500 students with a distraction from afternoon classes.

Caribe, a musical group singing reggae music with a south-of-the-border twist, performed in conjunction with the fourth annual "Festival Hispano Americano."

This year's festival, with the theme "Impact '84: Hispanics Rising to Meet the Challenge" ends today after a week of events emphasizing the cultural heritage, language and traditions of Hispanic students at K-State.

The festival has been sponsored by MEChA, the Puerto Rican Student Organization (PRSO) and the Office of Minority Affairs.

Raul Guevara, outreach coordinator for the Office of Minority Affairs, said the festival accents politics, education, women and Hispanic music.

"The festival's purpose is to show everyone else our culture by having displays, music and influential speakers," said Gary Sepulveda, sophomore in business marketing and president of Movimiento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlan (MEChA).

"We're proud of our culture, but we're Americans too," he said.

An address given by the man Guevara said he considers the most influential Hispanic speaker will highlight today's events.

National League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) President Mario Obledo, of Sacramento, Calif., will explain "The Socio-Economic and Political Condition of Hispanics in the U.S." at 3:30 p.m. in the Union Little Theatre.

A speech by Juan Andrade Jr., executive director of the Midwest Voter Registration and Education Project in Columbus, Ohio, will follow Obledo's talk. "Hispanic Impact on the '84 Elections" is Andrade's topic.

Guevara said this speech will be an important one because "Hispanics will be the swing vote in 1984."

Our Lady of Guadalupe Dancers will perform regional Mexican dances in the Union courtyard today beginning at 11 a.m.

Former governor of Puerto Rico, engineer and classical pianist Luis A. Ferre, opened the festival Saturday with a speech about Puerto Rican culture and a sample of his musical talents.

Guevara said the musical celebration which followed featured a diversity of talent. The Puerto Rico Canta, an 11-member student group, El Nuevo Mariachi Estrella, and Shamriguez, the Puerto Rican Prince of Magic, performed for a crowd of approximately 150.

Easter Sunday, the Rev. Ramon Gaitan, President of Los P.A.D.R.E.S. Inc. from Kansas City, Kan., conducted a Spanish mass. Tierra, another student group, provided special music.

Tuesday, Bill Platt, associate professor of law and director of the Washburn University legal clinic, spoke about the importance of higher education to minority students.

Wednesday, the Union Food Service prepared a Latin American breakfast, a Mexican lunch and a Puerto Rican dinner.

Tornado strikes near Silver Lake, leaves 5 injured

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — One home was destroyed and at least five people suffered minor injuries Thursday night when a tornado touched down west of Silver Lake, a small community northwest of Topeka, authorities said.

A car carrying two children injured in the tornado collided with another vehicle on rain-slick U.S. 24 east of Silver Lake as it sped toward a hospital, Shawnee County sheriff's dispatcher Mike Hanblin said.

Civil Defense Director Ken Burgett said emergency assistance crews arrived and transported the two children to a Topeka hospital. No one else was injured in the collision.

Hanblin said sheriff's officers were checking the Silver Lake area for injured people and structural damage from the tornado and high winds. At least five homes were damaged in the twister, authorities said.

The tornado spun southward into Shawnee County from Jackson County, where it touched down twice near Hoyt but caused no injuries or damage, authorities said.

Hanblin said the twister "cut a two- or three-mile wide path for about 10 miles that we'll have to check for damage." The tornado's path was mainly through rural and sparsely populated areas of the county, he said.

The storm that produced the tornado moved briskly out of Shawnee County and lost intensity, the National Weather Service said.

Hanblin said power to Silver Lake and surrounding areas was knocked out by the twister, which hit about 9:30 p.m.

Several funnel clouds also were reported in Shawnee and Jackson counties. They grew out of thunderstorms that rumbled across the state Thursday, producing golfball-size hail and strong winds in some areas.

National Weather Service radar indicated a possible tornado near Hutchinson Thursday evening, but the Reno County sheriff's office said no twister was sighted. Portions of the county received heavy rain and golfball-size hail in a thunderstorm, a sheriff's spokesman said.

Funnel clouds were reported in Harper and Marshall counties, but authorities reported no damage. Extreme eastern Kansas was under a tornado watch until 3 a.m. today.

Hail the size of golfballs also fell Thursday between Arkansas City and Winfield and at St. Marys, while heavy rain accompanied by small hail caused street flooding in Wamego.

A line of thunderstorms extended from south-central to northeast Kansas Thursday night, while scattered showers were reported in the west.

Strong southerly winds gusting to 35 mph blew across the state Thursday afternoon, pushing temperatures into the 80s across the east.

Policy terminates programs, not tenured faculty positions

By SUZANNE LARKIN
Staff Writer

Although Faculty Senate endorsed a document which provides for discontinuation of programs, it is not endorsing its use as a way to fire tenured faculty members, Richard Gallagher, president of Faculty Senate and professor of electrical engineering, said.

"The discontinuance policy is by no means a device or management tool used to fire tenured faculty members — that is not the intent of the policy or the action taken by Faculty Senate," Gallagher said.

Faculty Senate does not intend to combine programs just to eliminate three or four faculty members, he said.

If the document which the senate endorsed is studied, the University will benefit, Gallagher said.

"This policy, if studied thoroughly by each faculty member, will help faculty as well as administrators evaluate the programs fulfilling their missions and which need alteration. It could be a very important program-planning tool on campus," he said.

The discontinuance document states that just as programs are created from time to time in response to recognized needs, it sometimes becomes necessary to terminate programs. This may result from the reformulation of educational objectives, modification of objectives, a decline in program quality, priority changes or resource availability.

As the policy states, criteria used for discontinuance must reflect long-range judgments so that the teaching, research, extension and public service missions of the University as a whole will be significantly enhanced by the discontinuance. Program discontinuance should not be a response to temporary variations in enrollment or finances.

Under the criteria for discontinuance, the evaluation process requires that:

— Each college or division must have a statement on public file of its specific mission and a plan which shows how existing programs implement the mission.

— Proposed changes are justified in terms of the following criteria for determining program discontinuance:

1. The centrality of the program to

Prospects may be fading for drinking age increase

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A bill raising the legal age for drinking 3.2 percent beer in Kansas from 18 to 19 still was alive in the Senate Thursday, but prospects of its passage were fading fast.

"It's still breathing considerable life, but I think as time goes on the chances diminish that it will be adopted," Sen. Wint Winter Jr., R-Lawrence, said of a conference committee report which the Senate could adopt at any time and send the bill back to the House for almost certain passage.

Winter helped block a vote on the conference committee report before the Legislature recessed April 5, and serves on the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee, which recommended following a hearing Wednesday that the drinking age issue be tabled for this session and studied this summer.

Advocates of raising the age for drinking 3.2 beer to 19 could move at any time to adopt the conference committee report, which would do that. However, Senate Majority Leader Robert Talkington said not enough senators want to go on the record voting for or against increasing the drinking age in this election year to force a vote on it.

Unless someone assures him the procedural maneuvers to prevent consideration of the report won't be employed, the issue isn't likely to come up again in the Senate, Talkington said. In that event, it's dead for this year.

Magazine wins national awards

The Kansas State Engineer Magazine won four national awards at the Engineering College Magazines Associated (ECMA) meeting recently at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy, N.Y.

The magazine, published by students in the College of Engineering, won honorable mention for best all-around magazine; third place for best art/photography in a single issue; honorable mention for best art/photography in a single issue; honorable mention for best art/photography all issues; and honorable mention for best technical article. The awards were for the calendar year 1983.

The winning technical article, "Gear up and Throttle Down," was written by Keith Wagner, December 1983 chemical engineering graduate.

ECMA was established in 1915. K-State was a founding member of the organization, which represents magazines from engineering colleges throughout the United States.

Company executives visit campus

Hewlett-Packard Co., Palo Alto, Calif., has been named "Company of the Year" by the College of Engineering.

Four executives from the company will visit campus today to accept awards and participate in a day-long program sponsored by Tau Beta Pi, an engineering student honorary.

Hewlett-Packard was selected for the honor on the basis of its strong interest in education, its commitment to the engineering profession, and its support of the K-State engineering program.

Company representatives will spend the day lecturing to engineering classes, meeting with students and touring College of Engineering facilities. An awards banquet in the Union will end the day's activities.

Association sponsors 'Love Run'

The National Association for Retarded Citizens (ARC) will benefit from the proceeds of the first annual "Love Run" for ARC to be held on Saturday in Topeka. The five kilometer (3.1 miles) and 10 kilometer (6.2 miles) races are being sponsored by Zeta Tau Alpha, a sorority at Washburn University, and KMAJ-Magic 108, a Topeka radio station.

The 5K race will begin at 9 a.m. at Lake Shawnee and will be followed by the 10K race at 10:30 a.m.

Refreshments and T-shirts will be included in the $10 entry fee.

Medals will be awarded to individual winners in various age groups, and there will be overall trophies for the top male and female finishers.

Photographers place in contest

Two K-State students won awards recently in the 1983-1984 College Photographer of the Year contest.

John Sleezer, junior in journalism and mass communications, won second place for his portfolio, third place for sports photos, second and third places for news photos, second place for feature photos and first place for his picture story entry.

Sleezer has been named the Photo/Graphics Editor for the Kansas State Collegian and the Royal Purple yearbook for the 1984-1985 academic year.

Hurriyet Aydogan, senior in mechanical engineering, won first place for his pictorial entry.

Aydogan also is a photographer for the Collegian and Royal Purple.

Professor gives tips for relieving stress

By RHONDA BROWN
Collegian Reporter

With final examinations a week away, students should remember to keep themselves focused and under control while taking tests, advises Cliff Schuette, assistant professor of student development.

He outlined study tips and relaxation techniques to relieve exam-related stress during the semester's last "Let's Talk About It" lecture at noon Thursday sponsored by the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee.

"If you haven't learned the material by now, you can't pull an A out of a D," he said. He told the audience to be realistic and set appropriate goals, then budget their time.

Study techniques depend upon what kind of test is to be taken, he said, but it is important to locate and group material. Schuette also suggested forming hypothetical questions.

"This is especially important for essay tests," he said. "Some teachers give review questions. These are a gift; don't ignore them."

Forming study groups can be helpful, because more material can be covered and the group can rehearse the test, Schuette said. This can be distracting for some people, but for most it is beneficial to study with someone else.

Schuette suggested that every 40 to 50 minutes, students should take a study break for about 10 minutes. After 40 to 50 minutes, the ability to retain information decreases. Taking a short break allows students to relax and return to studying with better retention. It is also important to change topics every three to four hours, he said.

"Start imagining now, a situation in which you see yourself preparing for the test, studying for the test, actually going in the day of the test, sitting down, receiving the test, looking over the questions, determining which ones to start answering, successfully completing the test and leaving the test situation," Schuette said.

"The key is to do this in a very positive way. There's a lot of research to indicate that the way we view something is the way that we end up living out that situation," he said.

On the day of a test, students should stop studying about one hour prior to the exam so they'll be fresh when they begin to take the test, he said. For some people it is not helpful to talk about the exam just prior to the exam. For these people, Schuette suggested they not arrive early, but right on time.

"Look over the test and budget your time for each question," Schuette said. "Give more time to the questions that are worth more, and less time to the questions of less value."

Students should not panic over questions they don't know the answer to, but should go on to the next question, he recommended. Many times something will come to mind that pertains to a previously troublesome question, he said.

Schuette also advised students to block out all other activity in the room. It is not a good practice to watch others to see how they're doing, because test takers are not competing with others to see who can finish first, he said. Students should assume that the first person finished doesn't know very much about the material.

Factors that affect stress are physical self-care, caffeine, sugar intake and sleep, Schuette said.

"All-nighters" are hard on the body, and many students don't feel that they have time to prepare a proper meal, he said. It is best to avoid more than six, 6-ounce cups of coffee, and many soft drinks have caffeine in them, which inhibits both physical and mental response.

Sugar gives bursts of energy, but the energy decreases rapidly, making a person feel as though he needs more sugar, he said.

Some researchers feel that the body uses more vitamins when it is stressed, he said. Therefore, it is important to eat plenty of fruits and vegetables.

Sleep before a test is important, Schuette said. Students should get at least five hours of sleep before a test.

Because stress plays a big role in studying for finals, Schuette gave several relaxation techniques that students can use while studying or taking a test.

Tension builds in the head and shoulders throughout the day, Schuette said. To relieve this tension, do the Four S Relaxation Strategy: smooth forehead, smile, slack jaw and sag shoulders. This exercise can be done inconspicuously while studying or taking a test.

Another exercise that few people would notice is neck and shoulder rolls. Neck rolls should be done to stretch the neck but not injure the spine. Doing about three neck rolls in both directions will help relieve stress.

Shoulder rolls are done forward and backward.

Another neck exercise is to raise the shoulders to the ears, hold this position for five seconds, and then let them drop.

Many students will study extra hours on campus before and during finals week. The buildings open evenings during their regular hours are Ackert, Blumont, Denison, Seaton and Kedzie halls, Ahearn Field House and the music wing of McCain Auditorium.

The Union is now staying open until midnight, but the stateroom will close at 11:30 p.m.

Beginning today, Farrell Library will be open Thursday and Friday from 7:30 a.m. to midnight, Saturday from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. and Sunday from 2 p.m. to midnight. Monday through Thursday they will be open from 7:30 a.m. to midnight. On May 4, hours will be 7:30 a.m. to 5 p.m.; May 5, hours will be 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. and May 6, the library will be open from 2 p.m. to 10:30 p.m.

Rain causes road closings near Tuttle Creek Reservoir

Heavy rain has taken its toll on the banks of Tuttle Creek Reservoir, closing roads and washing away valuable soil.

Kathe Turner, project assistant of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers at Tuttle, said 13,500 cubic feet per second of water is being released from the lake. This amount is determined by the water control section of the district office in Kansas City, Mo., she said.

"We can't release water until we hear from them," Turner said. "Just awhile back, we couldn't release any water because the Missouri River was about a foot over normal."

Turner said the latest order to change the water gates came Tuesday. The normal depth for Tuttle is 1,075 feet, but with the latest rains, the level stands at 1,093.04 feet.

"Technically this happens every year," Turner said.

Soil erosion has been a major concern because of the high waters, she said. The two main roads closed due to the high water are the lower road leading to Tuttle Cove and the road leading into Stockdale.

She said she couldn't estimate how much other park land has been affected by high water.

Turner said reservoir officials make various readings at the lake and send the information to the Kansas City office, where it is entered into data banks and used to make decisions affecting Tuttle. She said she couldn't guess when the lake level would be back to normal.

Parachutists enjoy 'outrageous' hobby

By LILLIAN ZIER
Collegian Reporter

"Why would anyone want to jump out of a perfectly good airplane?" the skydiver's handbook for the K-State Parachute Club asks.

"It takes your breath away," Derrick Roberson, sophomore in arts and sciences, said. "It's like diving into space — up there where the birds are, you're kind of floating."

Roberson, who is a member of the club, made his first jump along with 40 other students this spring.

"It's probably the most outrageous thing you'll ever do," Doug Schmidt, graduate in entomology, said. "I was impressed with the K-State club."

"If you got through the sixth grade, you can skydive," he said. "You don't have to be brave either. I'm scared of heights. You do have to be able to train well, learn what you're taught and make decisions. You have to be aggressive. It's a stressful situation — about as stressful as a car accident, but much more fun."

Before leaping into the wild blue yonder, the prospective jumper must go through two days of instruction on a Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. Kevin Honomichl, sophomore in civil engineering, said.

Laura Pringle, freshman in pre-design professions, said that during the two-day training session, students become familiar with the equipment and how to operate it in emergency situations. They are instructed on jumping as well as how to land.

First jump students actually practice landing falls (PLFs) by jumping off three-foot, five-foot and eight-foot ledges, she said. They learn to land and roll over by hitting on their calves, then their thighs and across their backs, keeping their elbows in so the whole body absorbs the shock.

On Saturday afternoon, the jumpers go to the Wamego airport, which the club uses as a drop zone (an area designated for parachute jumping). When the plane reaches 3,000 feet, the jump master gives the command, "Set your feet out." The pilot then cuts the plane's speed and the jump master commands, "Go."

The first five jumps are made on a static line — a 15-foot nylon cord which is attached to the airplane and opens the parachute container.

When a jumper makes a free fall, he has his own rip cord. If he freezes, the Automatic Activation Device opens the reserve parachute.

"It senses when you're below 1,200 feet and falling faster than three quarters terminal velocity (120 mph)," Honomichl said. "It will fire a cartridge that will activate the reserve."

"The longer you jump, the longer free-fall you have," he said. "You begin with five-second delays (before pulling the rip-cord), then get progressively longer delays — 10, 15 seconds, etc."

Experienced skydivers may have as much as a 70-second delay when they jump from an altitude of 12,500 feet or higher.

The club does an annual demonstration jump at one of the K-State home football games. Last fall, three club members jumped at the Homecoming game against Iowa State University.

Jim McChesney, junior in pre-optometry and president of the club, made the jump during the game. He also competed at the Collegiate National Parachute Competition during Christmas 1982. The tournament has been held in Arizona four of the last five years, and last year McChesney was the only member to compete of the seven who attended.

"It's a scaled-down version of the national competition held every year in Muskogee, Okla.," McChesney said. "You do relative work — that's where two to four people jump out of an airplane and make different formations. There is a set sequence. You're given points on a scale of 10."

Also included was a style competition in which everyone jumps from 7,500 feet and does turns and backloops, and an accuracy competition to determine how close participants can land to a designated mark.

"The combined distance of all the jumpers was less than 10 centimeters away from the mark," he said.

"This year is the (K-State) club's 20th anniversary," McChesney said. "The club was officially recognized by the United States Parachute Association in 1965, but the organization actually started in 1964. We plan to do some sort of promotion this fall," he said.

University considers plan to close Dec. 21-Jan.1

The Administrative Council on Wednesday reviewed a proposal to close the University beginning the end of the workday Dec. 21 until Jan. 1, 1985.

According to Gene Cross, vice president of University Facilities, the move was made primarily to assist in energy conservation throughout the state and University. Cross said other universities in Kansas have made similar actions to save energy.

"This is just a move by this University, although other universities have made similar moves for the same reasons," Cross said. "We plan on saving between $30,000 and $40,000."

Charles Hein, director of University communications, said he thinks this is the first time K-State has undertaken such a program.

"Many universities have programs that do the same thing," Hein said. "It's hard to do it here with the animals and the experiments going on."

Hein said some rules concerning administration vacation policies are still being examined and some details still must be decided.

Under the proposal, some offices will remain open, Hein said. They include the agricultural experiment stations, cooperative extension service, veterinary medicine clinic, diagnostic laboratories, a several components in the Department of Surgery and Medicine, Hollis House (KSU Foundation headquarters), the data processing center, the admissions office, the registrar's office and the student financial assistance office.

Farrell Library, Hein said, will remain open on a reduced schedule from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. with a minimum staff.

Hein said K-State will officially reopen Jan. 2, 1985.

the missions and purposes of the University, including a consideration of the consequences of its loss.

2. The quality of the program as determined by standards appropriate to the area, and, if not satisfactory, the prospects and costs of restoring it to a satisfactory level.

3. The redistribution of resources to programs of higher priority that could be achieved as the result of termination of a program.

4. The demand as shown by enrollment in the program, services performed in support of other programs and the general public need.

Tenure is defined by the Kansas Board of Regents as a continuous appointment designed to protect the academic freedom of faculty, and can be terminated only in unusual circumstances after due process has been accorded. Gallagher said tenure can take up to seven years to obtain.

"If an individual is on tenure-track but not tenured, for example, if this person is in their third year and a program is discontinued, then that individual would be given every opportunity to be moved to another department or section of the present unit, taking into consideration the individual's specific talents. But the University has no obligation to this individual other than giving the proper notice of termination as specified in the Faculty Handbook," he said.

"If the individual is tenured, then the University has an obligation to move that individual or offer some retraining. The use of available resources, including sabbaticals and leaves to retrain this individual, can also be an alternative," Gallagher said.

According to the Faculty Handbook, reasons warranting termination of tenured faculty members are "...for adequate cause, except in the case of retirement for age, or under extraordinary circumstances because of financial exigencies."

The Board of Regents in its April 1982 meeting added "program or unit discontinuance" to the list of justifications for termination of tenured personnel with the stipulation that "...the Chief Executive Officer of each Regents' institution, in consultation with appropriate campus groups, be asked to develop procedural statements to ensure consistent and fair application of this provision..."

A set procedure will be followed in case of program discontinuation, Gallagher said.

The provost, acting on behalf of the University president, initiates an investigation which is conducted by the college planning committee for the college of which the program is a part. The committee may then recommend that the program be discontinued, improved or be left unchanged.

The committee's report will be sent to the Faculty Senate Committee on University Planning. It will review the report and determine the effect of the recommendation on the University. The report will then be forwarded to the provost, and then to the president for the final decision, Gallagher said.

Rape awareness continues

A public forum April 2 brought rape to the attention of the city of Manhattan. Now action to combat rape in the community continues.

The Manhattan Coalition Against Rape will distribute whistles and information about rape from 10 a.m. to noon Saturday at various locations of the Kansas State Bank, First National Bank, Union National Bank & Trust Co. and Citizens Bank and Trust Company.

The group requests a $2 donation to cover the cost of each whistle, which they advise will not automatically protect a woman from being raped. The whistles should be used in the event of an attack or impending attack.

The coalition's efforts deserve commendation for continuing to focus attention on the problem of rape. Such consideration can only be effective, however, if citizens are concerned enough to support the group by helping increase awareness and learning preventive measures.

Kennedy death exposes turmoil

David Anthony Kennedy, son of the late Sen. Robert Kennedy, is dead. Officials say there is no evidence of foul play and will not say his drug problem may have been the cause of death.

There may have been "no foul play," but Kennedy's untimely death seems to make final the evidence that his life was troubled and filled with turmoil.

It is a shame that prominent public figures who are idolized by the media, like the Kennedys, must suffer so in their private lives. It is even worse that they must die without having been given the chance to live a normal life.

Kennedy had a history of drug problems; in 1979 he was hospitalized with a heart condition associated with narcotics abuse. But to what extent was he offered help? Were his life and death just published in the paper because he was the son of a prominent politician?

This is not to say the death of Kennedy is not newsworthy, because it is. It fits the requirements for news. But let us hope the media and the public will not look at Kennedy's death in such a cold, indifferent manner — for his death implies much more.

He was troubled. He needed help. The extent to which he was helped should be considered by all. Society must not regard public figures as immortal newsmakers, but should be aware of their humanity and offer aid if they need personal help.

Robert Kennedy Jr., David's older brother, was recently given a two-year suspended sentence for possessing heroin. Heroin is not one of the so-called "social drugs" like marijuana or cocaine. It is a hard narcotic, used by troubled drug users. Heroin users are often addicts. Whether Robert Kennedy Jr. is a drug user or dealer, someone should help him before it is too late.

All students may participate in sports clubs

Editor: "Senators allocate sports funds," in the April 25 Collegian:

As a member of Sports Club Council, representing the K-State Ski Club, I'd like to present some opposition to Kelly Miller's view that "sports clubs don't benefit anyone at K-State except the individuals involved."

The Sports Club Council consists of the crew team, Parachute Club, Soccer Club, Rugby Club, Sailing Club, Racquetball Club and Water Ski Club. All groups in the council have an open door policy as to who may actively participate. It is not restricted to those who have talent in a certain sport. Because of this policy, any student on campus may participate in order to learn a new skill or improve an old one.

The recognized sports groups on campus (basketball, football, track, etc.) restrict their participants to those who have the superior ability to represent the school. The benefit one gains from participating in or viewing these games is purely a subjective matter, depending solely on the viewer's preference of competition.

Although sports club members participate in competition under the K-State name just as the recognized athletes do, they fail to receive the support of the athletic department, financially or otherwise. Since all organizations require a healthy budget to be active, the burden of these clubs' existence rests solely on the individuals' financial involvement and fund-raising activities.

I don't mean to complain about the amount of money the council was allocated, because it would be pointless due to declining enrollments. However, I felt the need to challenge a view which I felt was misconceived.

Philosophies vary in Philadelphia

WASHINGTON — The view from Congressman Tom Foglietta's Philadelphia office is intensely spectacular.

Looking south, the bold blue of the Ben Franklin Bridge and its monstrous metal expanse over the Port of Philadelphia dominate the skyline. The fragile blue water of the port divides the red brick row houses and office buildings into two sections on the left, while Independence Square with its Liberty Bell, Independence Hall and a multitude of tourists highlights the scene to the right.

South Philadelphia — a constituency of strongly defined ethnic neighborhoods that rarely cross over or intermingle, by movement, marriage or otherwise.

Italians, Poles and Irish — 100 years ago these ethnic immigrants got off their boats and never left the port area where they landed.

This new addition of the world's tired, poor and hungry who landed in Philadelphia looked to their politicians for guidance in their initial struggle to survive in an alien territory — and their local political leaders provided them with this sought-after help.

Politicians were expected to aid their constituents in solving housing problems, finding jobs and generally making life worthwhile. And the elected officials acquiesced.

Meanwhile, other boatloads of ethnics were also landing in port cities up and down the East Coast — not just Philadelphia, but New York, Boston and Baltimore. Some of these immigrants didn't stay at the port of their arrival, however. They hopped a covered wagon and went west, where even fewer stopped off and settled Kansas' western half, later to become the big 1st Congressional District.

The landscape they settled on was as different from the Philadelphia port area as their attitude would eventually become — acres of grassland, miles of sky, enough room to wander in for days without encountering another human being.

NANCY MALIR
Washington Correspondent

An entirely different political philosophy was to develop.

These immigrants took up farming, became self-sufficient and rejected the power of government. They decided everyone was capable of fending for themselves in life — or should be "Politicians" were to take care of only the details and let life proceed as it would.

Years have passed, yet little has changed. South Philadelphians still expect their politicians to take care of them. They still want their congressmen to help them rent a house or get their son out of jail.

Rural Kansans still harbor suspicions about government and prefer to be left alone. The manner in which the congressmen of these two districts handle constituent work is as diverse as the areas they represent.

While the Washington office of Congressman Pat Roberts, 1st District representative, receives an average of 10 calls a day concerning constituent services, Foglietta's Philadelphia office performs nothing but case work.

Only six people — one office manager, two legislative assistants, one legislative correspondent, an appointment secretary and a computer operator — are in Washington to handle constituent mail, research legislative issues and prepare the Congressman for committee hearings and floor action. Foglietta's remaining 12 employees work in Philadelphia taking care of constituents.

My liberal blood began to flow to the right after spending a day in the Philadelphia office talking to constituents who needed money, wanted to see a strip joint closed down and complained of various medical problems.

Poor Phyllis probably just wanted somebody to talk to, but after half an hour of listening to her ramble about her back problems, the fact that she lost her Supplemental Security Income and couldn't pay her monthly utilities, that she needed medical prescriptions she couldn't afford and that her sister's son was killed at age 21 in World War II, I felt more distant than sympathy.

What did she expect me — us — to do? Bring back the dead? If she hadn't left her pocketbook lying in her shopping cart while she walked around the grocery store, she wouldn't have lost her SSI check.

A day of listening to unknown people give vent to their sorrows and miseries left me with mixed feelings: uselessness and futility in trying to help humankind and disgust that some people can't take care of themselves.

Caught between two emotions, I was frustrated by sympathy and remorseful irritation.

The view from Foglietta's Philadelphia office was intensely spectacular. Looking south, the full blue of the Ben Franklin bridge and its monstrous metal expanse over the Port of Philadelphia reminded me that I wasn't in Kansas anymore — physically or politically.

Re: "Dubious hazing elicits complaint from 3 little sisters," in the April 18 Collegian:

At first I was prepared to let the issue stand as it is, but after reading Lee White's paid advertisement in the April 26 Collegian, I finally felt it was time to enlighten the Collegian staff on how I felt.

The trouble with the Sigma Phi Epsilon little sisters organization was unfortunate, and after talking to various Sig Eps, they felt the same way. I frequently talk to the Sig Eps; after staying in their house for two weeks on the fraternity exchange program, I made a lot of friends among the house's members.

It was reported that Troy Jordan, Interfraternity Council president, said, "The allegations were supported by members of other fraternities who were staying in the Sig Ep house at the time of the initiation."

I think it would have been wise of the Collegian staff to look into these reports and find out their validity. White said, "The Collegian only reported what it was told," which is fine, they are doing their duty, but is it also their duty to print false material? I would think that a worthy newspaper staff would check their sources before printing such articles.

I was in the Sig Ep house at the time of the initiation, and I feel that if the "allegations" were to be supported by members of the exchange program, someone should have contacted me and asked, especially if the insinuation is presented that I had in actuality said something. No one talked to me, and I found it quite shocking to read that I had supposedly said something.

In the future, I would appreciate it if the staff would inform me of things I had supposedly said, especially things about a group of individuals whom I was glad to be a member of for two weeks.

Community network fights county hunger

By LYNN MEIER
Collegian Reporter

Local businesses are taking steps toward combating hunger in the Manhattan community by contributing foodstuffs that are no longer marketable, but still usable and nutritious, to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

The organization is a non-profit community food network sponsored by the North Central Flint Hills Area Agency on Aging. It has been serving the community for two years, said Edith Stunkel, president of the organization's board of directors.

Stunkel said the objectives of breadbasket are to meet the continuing needs of the hungry in Riley County and to reduce the approximate 137 million tons of food that is wasted by Americans yearly.

Donations from local businesses, institutions and individuals are accepted at the breadbasket facilities, located at the Douglass Center Annex, 901 Yuma St. Perishables are stored in a large freezer at the facility, and foods are moved from the facility to existing agencies such as local churches and social agencies. The agencies then dispense the food to individuals who have been screened to establish their level of need, Stunkel said.

"Our organization was chartered as a food bank, as opposed to a pantry. As a food bank, our role has been to distribute food to agencies, although we have begun dispensing food to individuals who have been referred to us," Stunkel said.

Many Riley County residents who need food contact Social Rehabilitation Services (SRS) for assistance, Nancy Williams, SRS social worker, said.

"The role of the breadbasket has filled a large need in the community. We refer approximately one-third of our clients to the breadbasket," Williams said.

Board member Tom Mulhern said, "I feel good about the direction of the breadbasket. We've become established as a helping agency, and we're in a position to expand significantly and really take off."

Dutch Maid Supermarkets contribute to the organization on a regular basis, as does the American Institute of Baking (AIB) in Manhattan. During the next six to 10 weeks, AIB will donate 200 to 400 loaves of bread each night. The surplus can be frozen for prolonged periods to insure freshness when the bread is delivered to agencies, Stunkel said.

According to a recent article in the Manhattan Mercury, breadbasket representatives worked for three years attempting to obtain assistance from Dillons Stores Co. The grocery chain decided last fall to conduct an experiment with a food bank in Hutchinson, where the chain's headquarters are located. The program was deemed successful and as of March 1, Dillons Stores began to contribute to the breadbasket on a twice-weekly basis.

"We believe this arrangement represents a significant milestone for the breadbasket," Marcia Schuley, breadbasket staff member, said. "The regular contributions will greatly increase the availability of food for distribution and insure more regularity of supplies. We are truly grateful that Dillons was willing to experiment and can now verify to other groceries that food banks work and make sense."

Stunkel said negotiations are underway with other large food chains. Breadbasket members are working through the Kansas Legislature, she said.

Mulhern said most managers at the major chains in the area are sympathetic to the cause and would like to contribute, but are prevented from taking action because of company policy and red tape.

Stunkel said the organization currently is undergoing a transition in personnel. It plans to hire a half-time coordinator and facilities manager. She said the staff positions will be substantially upgraded to provide a higher level of stability for the organization.

"We would love to have more participation and awareness from campus and church groups. In the past, we've received support from greek organizations, Girl Scouts and many churches," Stunkel said.

Assistance in transporting food donations to agencies and maintenance of the facility are the two major areas where help is needed, she said.

"It's amazing how an idea in a community can take hold and become a physical entity," Stunkel said.

According to Stunkel, immediate goals for the organization include employing two new staff members. Long-term goals are to secure all major food stores in the area as donors and establish the organization in the community as a primary source of food.

Lack of Senate consensus kills state property classification

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The property classification issue died for the 1984 session when Senate Republican leaders decided Thursday not to debate a constitutional amendment developed by its tax committee and fine tuned by a bipartisan subcommittee trying to give it broader appeal.

"There's no consensus; they're going every which way," Senate President Ross Doyen said, explaining why the decision was made not to take up the Senate's time debating the issue as the Legislature strives to adjourn late Friday or Saturday.

Senate Democrats, pressing for submission of a constitutional amendment to the state's voters this year, tried to force debate on the issue, but lost a procedural vote to bring it up for debate, 18-21.

Asked if classification was dead for this year, Doyen replied, "I hope so."

Gov. John Carlin, a champion of classification to avoid property tax shifts resulting from statewide reappraisal of property, which is needed to eliminate present inequities in Kansas' property tax system, agreed the issue has been laid to rest for this session, but was upbeat about it.

"It's clear it's going no further this session," Carlin said through his press secretary, Mike Swenson.

"But the issue of classification has gone farther this year than it's ever gone. There has been more work on it, more debate and discussion than ever before. The governor believes that bodes well for classification in 1985."

Purpose of the proposed amendment is to classify various types of real property, then assess values to it at different percentages of fair market value — with a goal of locking into the constitution the property tax share the different classes now bear.

For example, urban single-family dwellings now shoulder about 18.5 percent of the total property tax burden in Kansas. Under the last bipartisan amendment put together, that class of property would bear 17.5 percent of the burden. Agricultural land now bears 15.4 percent of the burden and under the last plan would have carried 17.8 percent of the load.

Word of the GOP leaders' decision not to run the classification amendment in the final days of the '84 session came at a Senate Democratic caucus Thursday.

Doyen and Senate Majority Leader Bob Talkington confirmed it.

Doyen said classification ran into an insurmountable problem of trying to satisfy too many groups — with farm interests, business interests and the public's interests clashing over who got what kind of tax burden placed on them in locking a classification system into the constitution.

"The governor has had the advantage the last few years of talking about classification, without anything being before us to study," said Doyen. "When people had a chance to look at specific proposals, they saw it wasn't the panacea they thought it would be and no consensus could be developed."

Talkington said the latest attempt at a compromise, developed by Republican Sen. Bud Burke of Leawood, chairman of the Assessment and Taxation Committee, and Sen. Mike Johnston of Parsons, a member of that panel, and others, would not be presented to a Republican caucus to get its reaction.

The reason, he said, is too many GOP senators just don't want to battle the issue in the final hours of this session.

Johnston said, "Too many special interests oppose it, so we were just spinning our wheels."

Sen. Bert Chaney, D-Hutchinson, who also worked on the last compromise proposal, said a majority of the Republicans "decided they would just as soon wait until 1985."

Senate Minority Leader Jack Steineger was disappointed the GOP majority gave up on the issue. He called the latest plan "the best possible solution," and said Rep. James Braden, R-Clay Center, chairman of the House tax committee, agreed.

Steineger said Republican leaders "understand they are giving up on reappraisal as well."

Carlin has said repeatedly he will never allow a bill ordering statewide reappraisal to take effect unless it is accompanied by submission of a classification amendment to a vote of the people.

As to the future, Steineger said, "We'll just kind of hang loose and see how things develop on classification."

Kansas trucker killed in accident

ALLENTOWN, Pa. — Three construction workers and a truck driver were killed and two others were injured when a tractor-trailer rig plowed into a highway construction site on Route 22 in Lehigh County on Wednesday night, state police said.

State police reported that truck driver Herbert Smith, 55, of Argonia, was killed when his rig struck and killed three construction workers who were working in the left eastbound lane of the highway in South Whitehall Township.

The three construction workers, all from Pennsylvania, were identified as George Hagenbuch, 48, of Northampton; Cleo Beers, 63, of Lehigh, and John Wargo, 36, of Jim Thorpe.

Smith's wife, Betty June, and construction worker Ronald Dugan, 34, of Dallas, Pa., were taken to Lehigh Valley Hospital Center, Moe said.

The accident occurred at 10:45 p.m. as the crew worked on the median guardrail. Moe said the work site was posted with signs and that the workers had parked two pickup trucks and a car in the left lane.

Mother committed for killing girls

WICHITA — Teresa Heath, 27, was found innocent by reason of insanity Thursday in the October stabbing deaths of her two daughters.

Sedgwick County District Judge Paul Clark ordered Heath committed to Larned State Hospital. Clark made the ruling after Heath waived a jury trial and her lawyers stipulated she had stabbed the girls. Prosecutors stipulated she was legally insane at the time.

She had been charged with two counts of first-degree murder in the Oct. 16 deaths of Melinda Elder, 6, and Lucinda Ridgway, 3.

Richard Heath, 54, stepfather of the girls, told police he was awakened by noises and found the girls had been stabbed repeatedly as they slept. He said he scuffled with his wife as she tried to stab herself with a 14-inch butcher knife.

Heath sustained stomach and chest wounds. During questioning by police, her husband sustained a mild heart attack and was hospitalized.

Reagan aims to counter terrorism

WASHINGTON — President Reagan asked Congress on Thursday for sweeping authority to prosecute Americans who support or act in concert with groups that the secretary of state says engage in terrorism.

The bill is one of four proposals sent to Congress aimed, Reagan said, at countering international terrorism. The other bills would establish federal jurisdiction over hostage-takings, tighten laws against aircraft sabotage, and provide rewards of up to $500,000 for information on terrorism.

The legislative package follows Reagan's April 3 signing of the secret National Security Decision Directive 138, which permits preemptive strikes and reprisals against terrorists, administration officials said.

The most controversial portion of Reagan's legislative package is likely to be the proposal to imprison Americans for up to 10 years if they are convicted of supplying, training or acting "in concert with, the armed forces or any intelligence agency of any foreign government, faction, or international terrorist group" which is publicly designated a terrorist organization by the secretary of state.

House sustains trending factors veto

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — House Democrats, resisting intense pressure from business constituents and Republican leaders, stood their ground Thursday and sustained Gov. John Carlin's veto of the trending factors bill.

The vote to override was 81-43, three shy of the 84 votes required to overturn the governor's veto.

That kept intact Carlin's incredible record of never having had one of his vetoes overridden by the Legislature in the six sessions he has been governor. Three votes to override have succeeded in the Senate over the years, but none has ever won two-thirds approval in the House.

The Senate had voted 35-4 Wednesday to override the trending factors veto.

All 43 votes to sustain in the House came from Democrats. Nine other Democrats voted with the 72 House Republicans to override.

"I am very pleased that the House sustained this veto, because I've always believed it was right," Carlin said after the vote. "Winning with only one vote to spare is like winning the pennant by half a game. You still get the pennant."

Carlin said the only "pressure" he had to apply to House Democrats to keep them with him "was to assure them that I will implement those provisions of the bill applying to trending factors."

The governor said the state Revenue Department would move quickly to implement the first part of the bill placing restrictions on how the Property Valuation Division employs trending factors, with which he agreed.

Carlin had said he vetoed the bill because of a provision which prohibited the appraisal of business property on a unit basis, rather than appraising individual pieces of machinery. He said that provided an unwarranted tax break to cable television companies, among others, and violated the principle of tax fairness.

While his veto stands, Carlin said the problems of property taxation continue in Kansas because of inequities in the valuation system.

"Everyone must understand that the only way to really solve the problem is through a property classification amendment," he said.

The House has adopted a resolution to submit a proposed classification constitutional amendment to voters in November, but the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee heavily amended it and there is doubt the two houses can agree on the form of an amendment by the time the Legislature adjourns late today or Saturday.

Sustaining Carlin's veto was an impressive victory not only for the Democratic governor, but also for House Minority Leader Marvin Barkis, who in his first session as his party's leader in the lower legislative chamber held his troops in line during the hottest firefight of the 1984 session.

Barkis told the House there were reasons Carlin has never had a veto overridden, and loyalty of the House Democrats he once led as speaker was just one of them. The main reason, the House minority leader said, is that Carlin "serves as our checks and balances" and every once in a while his staff "finds a ringer" in reviewing bills passed by the lawmakers.

"This bill is a ringer," Barkis said, because it would unfairly give a big tax break to cable television companies.

"Let your principles, not your politics, be your guide," Barkis told the House before the vote.

Rep. James Braden, R-Clay Center, chairman of the House Assessment and Taxation Committee, disagreed with Barkis' contention that the section of the bill prohibiting consideration of the success of a business in setting a value on the equipment represented special legislation for cable TV companies.

"This is a relatively new concept," said Braden. "I don't know how you can consider the 'good will' or the success of a business in valuing that equipment. And it would apply to a lot of other things, like bowling alleys, not just cable companies."

The vote represented a significant defeat for Republican Speaker Mike Hayden, who pulled out all stops to override the veto in the House after the Senate had voted so overwhelmingly to override.

The Republican leadership made an override on this bill a partisan cause celebre in the House, not only because business was pressing so hard for the measure but also because it was the closest the Legislature has come in six sessions to nailing Carlin with an override.

Democratic House members told of being threatened to have pet legislation left to die on the calendar if they did not vote to override. Hayden has complete authority over the House calendar, deciding which legislation is considered and which is left to languish and die.

Rep. Norman Justice, D-Kansas City, emotionally told the House he had been "intimidated" in an attempt to get him to vote to override. He said the leadership had threatened to let die a resolution he has submitted to the House for many sessions to disapprove investments by state government in South African businesses.

"I have been intimidated. I will not stand for it," Justice, one of only three black representatives, said during the override debate. "If we have to mix human rights with petty politics and intimidation, then I don't want any of my legislation to be passed by this body."

However, after that debate the House went to its regular debate calendar and Justice's resolution was discussed and adopted, 85-35.

On the other side, Rep. Larry Erne, D-Coffeyville, a strong advocate of limiting the Property Valuation Division's use of trending factors to appraise the machinery, said the bill was the only way the business community could be assured they would be properly used and would not punish business.

Business lobbyists urged an override of the trending factors bill, arguing that use of that method to appraise industrial equipment for taxation had placed artificially high values and unfairly increased their personal property taxes.

However, Carlin and the Democrats said the proper way to address the problem of appraising business machinery was to submit to voters a constitutional amendment to classify property, so that equipment could be taxed differently than other property if that is what the Legislature wants to do.

Official says Czechs fired at helicopter

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A Pentagon spokesman acknowledged Thursday that a U.S. Army helicopter strayed about six miles into Czechoslovakia's air space last week because of pilot error, but he denounced Czech jet fighter pilots for firing missiles and a cannon at the aircraft.

Spokesman Michael Burch contradicted reports by West German authorities that no such firing took place, and said "the use of the cannon and missiles was excessive and unwarranted."

Burch spoke to reporters, making public results of an investigation by the U.S. European Command that found the unarmed Cobra helicopter flew across the West German border last Friday and fled home undamaged after being chased by two Czech MiG-21 jet fighters.

At the same time, Burch said, it would have been more "prudent" for the Czech planes to have escorted the errant helicopter out of their territory without shooting. He disputed a suggestion that the two planes fired only warning shots.

Burch accused the Soviets and East Germans of repeated violations of the East-West German borders, saying there were four such incidents by East German and Soviet helicopters on March 6, 7, 8 and 10.

"We detected the intrusions, but there were no shots fired," he said. He was unable to say if U.S., West German or other allied planes were scrambled.

The alleged Soviet and East German helicopter intrusions into West Germany were protested through diplomatic channels, he said.

Burch's statement confirmed reports attributed by West German authorities to eyewitnesses that the helicopter had entered Czech air space. However, the U.S. version was at odds with a statement by Bavarian border police who said the Army helicopter was not fired on.

In a separate statement, the West German Border Police in Munich said there was "no evidence" that the helicopter was fired on.

Asked about this statement, Burch stuck to the Pentagon version.

During questioning, Burch said the two Cobra crewmen, whom he declined to identify, were grounded pending a review. He said the pilot was qualified for flights along the border since last August.

"I don't think weather was a factor," Burch said. Pentagon sources said last Friday that weather over the border region was clear.

Burch estimated the helicopter penetrated about 10 kilometers, or about 6.2 miles, into Czech air space, and that it was over Czech territory for about 20 minutes.

Citizens voice fears about arterial plan

By LEE WHITE
Manhattan Editor

Residents of Manhattan's south side voiced concern at a public hearing Thursday night in City Auditorium about noise and safety problems they think might arise if the southern arterial is built.

The four-lane, undivided highway is to be built from the intersection of Fort Riley Boulevard, Yuma and 17th Streets along what is now El Paso Street to Tuttle Creek Boulevard on the city's east side. City officials said at the hearing that authorization to acquire the 27 residences and 11 businesses the project will displace could come as early as Sept. 4.

The city is tentatively scheduled to let a contract on the arterial for July 15, 1985.

"I don't think we have a chance in hell of preventing the arterial from going through there," said Nina Miley, Rural Route 3, a representative of the South Manhattan Neighborhood Association Inc. She urged city planners to use their expertise to find a more ideal plan to route traffic from west to east.

The concerns the association expressed were common among those who spoke in protest to parts of the plan. Miley cited four of those concerns:

— Noise pollution created by more and faster-moving traffic would be injurious to public health. Each time a large truck would pass through the neighborhood, the noise level would increase more than 10 decibels above that considered appropriate for residential areas.

— The proposed landscaping, which consists mainly of grass planting, would be inadequate for aesthetic purposes and as a natural barrier to noise.

— Carbon monoxide levels would increase.

— Children using the Douglass Center pool may risk being struck by cars because drivers would have access to the arterial on 10th Street. Making the access on 11th Street would be safer.

In response to the concerns, Ed Mulcahy, an engineer who helped prepare the environmental impact statement on the arterial, said having access to the arterial on 11th Street would be just as dangerous because of pedestrians crossing the street to reach Griffith Park.

Director of Public Works Bruce McCallum said he expects sufficient landscaping to be undertaken to continue an award-winning local tradition. The impact statement indicates that the noise levels will be within guidelines and the carbon monoxide level is not regulated.

Two representatives of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce offered brief statements of support for the project, as did City Commissioner Rick Mann.

Denny Klepper and Don Bales, of Wichita-based Klepper Oil Co., which may lose two service stations — one to downtown redevelopment and the other to the arterial — attended the hearing, but were represented by local attorney Mark Furney.

Furney cited a 1971 Manhattan Mercury story that stated the Urban Renewal Agency had killed a similar project for lack of necessity.

"What has, in fact, changed in the past 13 years?" Furney asked.

"The changes are significant and have a significant effect on a community of this size," McCallum answered.

He said that in meetings more than two years ago, south side residents expressed "substantial support for the project as it is today."

Woman pleads guilty in Brink's case

By The Associated Press

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. — In a surprise plea bargain, one-time Weather Underground leader Kathy Boudin pleaded guilty Thursday to murder and robbery stemming from the 1981 holdup of a Brink's truck.

"I feel terrible about the lives that

Westchester County Court Judge David Ritter said he would sentence the 40-year-old former fugitive May 3 to a term of 20 years-to-life in prison on her guilty plea to one count each of murder and robbery. She could be paroled in the year 2001.

She could have faced 75 years to life if convicted of all 13 counts.

Standing next to her father, civil liberties lawyer Leonard Boudin, Ms. Boudin read a statement in which she said she regretted the $1.6 million holdup in which two policemen and a guard were killed.

"I feel terrible about the lives that were lost as a result of this incident," Boudin said. "I have led a life committed to political principles. I believe I can be true to these principles in various ways without engaging in violent acts."

But she insisted that her role in the crimes was limited — she was unarmed, she said — and according to her lawyer, she has no intention of testifying against others accused in the episode.

The plea came as a jury was being selected to try Boudin. The judge said he would not accept the plea unless persuaded that Boudin was actually guilty.

In her statement, Boudin detailed her involvement in the bungled holdup. It was her job, she said, to wait with getaway vehicles at a switch point, a distance away from the robbery.

Ritter said he accepted the plea because there was "no evidence Ms. Boudin ever participated in a violent crime." Hers was a "secondary role," the judge said. "Also significant is that she is reported to be remorseful and contrite about the deaths and injuries...That sets her apart from those previously sentenced."

Three other defendants — Judith Clark, 33; Kuwasi Balagoon, 36; and David Gilbert, 39 — were convicted Sept. 14 of the crime by an Orange County jury. Boudin married Gilbert, with whom she has a 3-year-old son, in a jailhouse ceremony on the day of his conviction.

Each of those defendants was sentenced to 75-years-to-life — three consecutive terms for the three murders.

Prior to her capture in the Brink's case, Boudin was last seen fleeing naked from a 1970 explosion of a Greenwich Village townhouse police said was used by radicals as a bomb factory.

She spent 10 years in the Weather Underground, which bombed public buildings during that time of turmoil, but was quoted in an interview recently as saying she was a woman who "has made mistakes."

Boudin smiled at her mother, Jean, in the back of the courtroom and to Bernardine Dohrn, a former member of the Weathermen, who now is the legal guardian of Boudin's son, Chesha.

After the court session, Boudin's lawyer, Leonard Weinglass, explained the plea. "Kathy never contended that she was an innocent. She merely contended she was not as guilty as they said she was."

Kenneth Gribetz, Rockland County district attorney, said he was pleased with the end result. "She's behind bars for 20 years. She's been punished. It's an appropriate punishment," he said.

Low-income farmers may obtain free legal aid

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A controversial proposal to provide free legal services to low-income farmers on financial issues and a bill permitting seeing-eye dogs in restaurants were among a handful of measures passed Thursday in the Kansas House.

The lower chamber also killed a bill which would have extended a 20 percent inheritance tax credit, with a maximum $5,000 value, for contributions of artwork, property or cash donated to any charitable organization.

The legal services bill, which passed 84-42, would authorize the attorney general's office to contract with Kansas Legal Services to provide legal advice to low-income farmers.

The advice would be restricted to helping the farmers determine their rights in obtaining financial assistance under any federal programs and federal agencies, and would include representation in judicial and administrative proceedings involving federal credit agencies, debt relief and debt services.

"This bill is aimed at helping indigent farmers," said Rep. Harold Dyck, R-Hesston. "It was requested by the attorney general to help low-income farmers involved in dealings with federal agencies."

However, Rep. Kerry Patrick, R-Leawood, opposed parts of the bill, and said free legal services should be provided to businesses as well, if the farmers are given free legal advice.

"Why not expand it to include businessmen?" Patrick asked. "There are a lot more businesses filing for bankruptcy each year than farmers by a wide margin. I'd say they need the help more."

Rep. John Solbach, D-Lawrence, sharply disagreed and chastized Patrick for his attitude that farmers are "not as smart as businessmen."

"Farmers need advice on their entire financial position," Solbach said. "Maybe if more of them did have legal advice they would file for bankruptcy more often, instead of liquidating their property. At least they'd end up with something to try and start over again."

Jazz artist Count Basie dies of cancer

By The Associated Press

HOLLYWOOD, Fla. — Count Basie, whose bright, simple piano style brought him international fame in the "swing" era of jazz, died in his sleep early Thursday of cancer, a disease his doctors never told him he had. He was 79.

"It's a great loss. I hate to even think about it," jazz musician Lionel Hampton said. Basie was "one of the true greats of music. He had his own particular style... It was one of the greatest styles you could hear."

"He'll be remembered as long as there is a world," said composer-pianist Dave Brubeck. "He was loved all over the world and all the jazz musicians had tremendous respect for him and he'll never leave us."

"He was the best. He was a cool person," said Anita O'Day, who sang with Basie's orchestra in the 1940s. "Everything he played was always the right little riff in the right little place."

Basie, who began his career in the 1920s as a $3-a-night piano player, was hospitalized for treatment of a severe ulcer, but doctors soon learned he had pancreatic cancer, said Dr. Leo Schildhaus.

"Had he known or been aware that he had cancer — he had such a fear of it — he would have given up hope of living. Anyone that might have seen him in Hollywood would know that he did not look as though he had a problem," Aaron Woodward, Basie's adopted son, said at a news conference.

Basie was admitted to Doctors' Hospital Feb. 4 with jaundice, Schildhaus said. He said that condition was relieved but Basie "had another upset," a bleeding ulcer. Basie was released from the hospital Feb. 14, then was readmitted March 27, Schildhaus said.

"The family was with him to the end," the doctor added.

He had performed at the Hollywood Palladium in California March 19, his last public performance before he decided to return to the hospital. He had also given a private performance in Los Angeles for a tribute to jazz singer Ella Fitzgerald.

"A number of people came to see him at the Palladium, including his longtime friends Quincy Jones, Joe Williams... Scatman Crothers," said Woodward. "Those individuals and the audience that heard him play on that day helped to make his most recent time here (at the hospital) very special. They will never know what they did to make him happy."

Basie, born William Basie in Red Bank, N.J., embarked on his career as a piano player in a Chinese restaurant on the New Jersey coast, and went on through a series of appearances in theaters, speakeasies, hotels and nightclubs across the country.

Basie wrote "One O'Clock Jump," "Jumpin' at the Woodside," "Don't You Miss Your Baby," and "I Left My Baby."

"We just play music," he once said. "And we try to make it swing."

De Lorean's lawyers demand trial's end

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — John Z. De Lorean's lawyers demanded dismissal of all charges against him Thursday after an FBI agent admitted on the witness stand he had destroyed some notes in the government "sting" investigation.

"We asked the judge during a bench conference for a dismissal and for sanctions against the government," defense attorney Donald Re said. "The judge is deciding what he will do about this."

The attorneys rushed to the bench for the private conference seconds after agent Benedict Tisa said during cross-examination he "probably threw away" his original notes on events that occurred during the government's "sting" operation against the automaker.

"I may have rewrote the notes," undercover agent Tisa conceded after attorney Howard Weitzman produced Tisa's handwritten report showing a confusing chronology dated both 1982 and 1983.

The attorney observed that the De Lorean probe had ceased in October 1982, and there could be no current notes on the case dated 1983.

"I may have added to them," said Tisa, who insisted he did not destroy any of the original contents.

De Lorean is charged with conspiracy to distribute $24 million worth of cocaine. If convicted, he could be sentenced to up to 72 years in prison.

De Lorean, 59, a maverick automaker who launched his own auto plant in Northern Ireland, was arrested Oct. 19, 1982, the same day the plant was closed by the British government for insolvency.

He has claimed the alleged drug deal in his case was actually a government setup to make him look guilty when he wasn't.

In the first week of the trial testimony, jurors saw and heard dozens of surveillance tapes which showed De Lorean, desperate for money to save his failing company, meeting with men he did not know were undercover agents posing as drug dealers.

Tisa's direct testimony ended Wednesday with the showing of a dramatic videotape featuring a suitcase full of cocaine and De Lorean toasting to "a lot of success" moments before he was arrested and handcuffed.

Senate passes aid bill for community colleges

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A proposal to provide a $3.7 million increase in state aid next year to Kansas' 19 community colleges and Washburn University passed the Senate on Thursday and was sent to the House.

Also the upper legislative chamber passed a bill easing newly enacted restrictions on bingo operations.

Community colleges and Washburn University of Topeka currently receive about $27.5 million in state aid. The bill passed by the Senate would add an extra $3.7 million during the next fiscal year, which begins July 1. That is about $1.5 million more than recommended ed by Gov. John Carlin in his budget.

The bill calls for a $2 increase in credit hour aid, from $23 to $25 next year for each credit hour taken by full-time students. The measure does not increase out-district aid, which is paid for students who attend a community college outside of the taxing district of their place of residence.

During debate, the Senate rejected efforts by Topeka lawmakers to increase state aid for the law school at Washburn.

The bingo bill, passed 38-1, revises two provisions in the new law which takes effect July 1. One change will permit bingo operators to charge $1 instead of 50 cents for each card to play a game. The second change eliminates a provision which would prohibit bingo games from being conducted in neighboring buildings within 44 hours of one another.

Complaints from fraternal and civic groups which raise money through bingo games prompted the legislation. In particular, many smaller organizations contended they would lose money if limited to 50 cents a bingo card.

Sen. Edward Reilly, R-Leavenworth, urged passage of the bill, saying bingo would become a campaign issue for legislators seeking re-election this year if the new law is not changed.

"It is a hot issue," said Reilly.

Also Thursday, the Senate passed bills to:

— Protect ethyl alcohol producers from imports of their product which is used to make gasoline. There are four alcohol plants in Kansas and two more are planned. Currently the state gallonage tax on motor vehicle fuels is 5 cents less for gasoline than gasoline. The bill would deny the tax break to products using foreign-produced alcohol and grant it only to gasoline using ethyl alcohol produced in the United States.

— Require county or private mental health centers to conduct evaluations of defendants to determine whether they are competent to stand trial. Currently about half are done at state mental institutions, such as the Larned State Hospital. The bill passed 39-0 and goes to the House.

Kansas City jazz singer Marilyn Maye sings in McCain Auditorium on Wednesday during a benefit concert for K-State's Department of Music.

Singer jazzes benefit...

By LUCY REILLY
Collegian Reporter

The classic sounds of the big band era coupled with tunes from numerous Broadway hits had the audience at McCain Auditorium bobbing in rhythm Wednesday night.

Marilyn Maye, Kansas City jazz singer, performed a benefit concert with proceeds going to the Department of Music. Accompanied by her own trio of musicians, Maye began the show with a song from "My Fair Lady" entitled "On the Street Where You Live."

Wearing a stunning blue-gold gown, Maye jazzed the number up with her rich, fluid voice, resembling ella "is it live or is it Memorex" Fitzgerald.

Versatility emanated from Maye as she performed an upbeat version of James Taylor's "Smiling Face." Other modern tunes sung by the Kansas City singer included Quincy Jones' "Just Once," "No Bad News" from the Broadway production of "The Wiz," "I Will Survive" and "Come in From the Rain."

Maye's performance was informal, lending a sense of intimacy to the concert. Twice she stopped singing, asking the technicians to turn the lights down, claiming "I can't sing sad songs in all that light."

The audience, appreciating Maye's quips throughout the show, was taken aback at one point though, when the entertainer snapped at her drummer for missing his cue. In a barely audible voice, Maye attempted to make light of the situation by mocking herself, saying "She may be sweet, but she's a disciplinarian."

Singing some Cole Porter songs made famous by Sinatra, Maye demonstrated her ability to perform blues. A familiar Maye trait by the end of the evening was the skill with which she oozed from one note to the next.

Other well-known musicians whose work Maye performed included Tommy Dorsey, Fats Waller, Rodgers and Hart, Hank Williams and Nat King Cole.

Some musicals which Maye had selected scores from were "Ain't Misbehaving," "Mame," "Hello Dolly" and "Cabaret."

Exuding a commanding stage presence, Maye demanded attention. Not satisfied with merely crooning the tunes, she performed them — whether she pranced around or flippantly tossed her hands about. Whatever she did, it was effective.

Talking one-on-one with the crowd, the singer relayed that her first love is performing jazz concerts. Her other love, performing in musicals, runs a close second. Having recently finished a run of "Mame" in Houston, Maye admits her addiction for the character.

"Mame is a high for me. My philosophy of life is a lot like Mame's," Maye said.

Currently, Maye is preparing for her starring role in "Hello Dolly," which opens in June at the Lone Star Amphitheatre in Galveston, Texas. Maye's rendition of the song, Louis Armstrong-style, only demonstrated her affinity for the role.

Accompanying Maye and her trio was the big band sound of the K-State "Hip Band." The 14 musicians of the group joined the entertainer on stage late in the program.

Another dimension to Maye's versatility was Hank Williams' "Your Cheating Heart." Saying that country music has always "been popular in Nashville, the Ozarks and Salina," she belted out the Kansas twang version in "city-western style."

Not one to forget her origin, Maye spoke often of her Kansas heritage. Although she owns homes in Overland Park and California and an apartment in Houston, she said she still considers Kansas home. For the Harry S. Truman Centennial, she is recording an album. A release date for the album has not been announced.

The singer concluded the evening with an upbeat "Make Your Own Kind of Music," bringing the audience to their feet. Coaxed to continue, the singer teased the audience before finally relenting with a leg-kicking "Cabaret."

Backstage afterwards, Maye and K-State Assistant Registrar, Steve Hall, were reunited in a warm embrace. At one time, Hall was a drummer for Maye while she performed at clubs in Kansas City.

In her dressing room later, Maye recalled her first experiences in the music world.

"I was nine or 10 years old when I had my own amateur radio show on WIBW in Topeka," she said.

Her first appearance with a band was under the direction of Matt Betton at Meadow Acres Ballroom in Topeka. Later, she produced a local KC album. An attempt to sell the record to Pacific Jazz Records, owned by entertainer Steve Allen, failed.

"He didn't buy the album, but he bought the singer (herself) instead," Maye said.

While Maye was performing on her final Steve Allen Show, an executive of RCA saw her, took a chance and signed her to a recording contract. Judging by her performance Wednesday, he obviously made the right choice.

Steve Hall, K-State assistant registrar, who played drums for Maye during his high school years, receives a hug from Maye after her performance.

...visits local drummer friend

By LUCY REILLY
Collegian Reporter

Johnny Carson, Phil Donahue and Manhattan's Kellstrom's Pharmacy all have one common characteristic — all have been a part of the musical career of Steve Hall.

Hall, a 42-year-old drummer and assistant registrar at K-State, has an illustrious past and looks forward to a bright future.

"I wanted to be a firefighter or a ballplayer (when growing up)," Hall said. Then, at 13, he discovered the drums.

Although growing up in St. Joseph, Mo., seemed less than conducive to an aspiring drummer, he dreamed of the big time. Hall's dream: to play for a well-known big band.

While in high school, his career began to bud. Marilyn Maye, a jazz singer who performed in Kansas City clubs, asked Hall to accompany her. Too young to legally consume the drinks served around him, the enjoyment Hall derived from playing may have proved intoxicating enough.

After a particular evening performance, Maye was approached by an agent of entertainer Steve Allen, who expressed an interest in her singing talents. The agent asked Maye to submit a tape for Allen to hear. Maye willingly complied. Percussions on the recording were provided by the fresh-faced schoolboy from St. Joe.

Schoolboys grow into college boys, so Hall went off to the University of Kansas, later transferring to North Texas State University to pursue a degree in history. While at the university, he joined the North Texas State Lab Band. Making appearances at the Wichita State Jazz Festival, the North Texas bunch won the collegiate jazz festival three consecutive years.

Shortly thereafter, Hall found himself in St. Joseph when he received a telephone call from a man who identified himself as the director of the Glenn Miller Band — the big band. Hall's career wasn't merely blooming — it was in full blossom.

The telephone caller was Ray McKinley. McKinley had been the drummer during the glory days of the band, when Miller was still alive. It was when Hall performed with the Glenn Miller Band that he made appearances on the Tonight and Phil Donahue shows.

The advantages of playing with the band were well-received. Hall grew accustomed to the special privileges encountered as a member of the famed band.

"I got spoiled when I played with the Glenn Miller Band. Ludwig (a music company) sponsored the band, so we were using Ludwig equipment, free of charge. We didn't pay for anything — anything we wanted, we got," Hall said.

Travel was alluring for the young Hall. He said his favorite place to play was New York City because it abounded in entertainment. When the Glenn Miller Band wasn't jazzing it up somewhere, band members would catch jazz and other big bands in the Big Apple.

But the allure diminished after 85 consecutive nights on the road. Driving as much as 300 miles a night on a bus can get a little weary, and Hall admitted that the glamour of performing had faded since the days of the big band era.

'I got spoiled when I played with the Glenn Miller Band. We didn't pay for anything — anything we wanted, we got.'

— Steve Hall

"If I'd wake up and see pine trees, I'd know we were in the North, and if I saw palm trees, I knew we were in the South," he said.

Caught up in the sights and sounds of fulfilling his dream, Hall knew it couldn't last forever. But forever came sooner than he thought. In 1965, after three years with Miller, Hall was drafted and sent to Vietnam.

After completing his term of service, Hall returned home to Missouri. Despite his absence from the musical world, Hall hastened to resume playing the drums. He played for various acts in Kansas City and finished his undergraduate degree before deciding to pursue a graduate degree in history at University of Colorado.

Goals were established elsewhere, and Hall began pursuing them. After acquiring his master's degree in the cold climate of Colorado, the drummer enrolled at the University of Arizona seeking a doctorate degree in history.

While still working on his dissertation, Hall decided to involve himself in the administrative aspects of a university. He was assigned to the position of assistant registrar at Northwest Missouri State University in Marysville. He then shuffled into an administrative job for a year prior to coming to K-State in fall 1983.

Hall said the job of assistant registrar at K-State entails working with three specific areas: enrollment, records and transcripts. Hall strikes acquaintances as a man happy and satisfied in his endeavors. Being employed at K-State is another notch on his successful record.

"I like it (K-State). I think it's great. The students are fantastic and the faculty is excellent. There are good people here," Hall said.

Wherever Hall is, music is sure to follow. Currently he is a member of the Palace Jazz Band, a Manhattan product.

"The joke is we're the band that never plays because we don't get to practice too often," Hall said.

For the few times the band does get together to practice, Kellstrom's Pharmacy provides just the right acoustics — not to mention its accessibility.

Throughout pursuing degrees and maintaining jobs, Hall has remained active with the drums, yet he isn't tapping out tunes as prolifically as he once did.

"Playing now is a hobby anymore. I don't practice as much as I should. I'm not as good as I used to be," Hall said.

Matt Betton, a good friend of Hall's, is a member of the Palace Jazz Band. The band, along with selected musician friends of Betton's, combined to form the temporary Matt Betton Band, which performed for the Alumni Homecoming Dance last fall.

The Palace Jazz Band has played in numerous towns throughout Kansas.

The music the group plays is "as close to authentic Dixieland as you can get," Hall said. "We classify ourselves as a Chicago-type jazz." Chicago jazz is classified such because of its 4/4 feeling, he said.

Hall estimates his drum set is worth $3,000, and yet he isn't willing to pay an additional $150 to buy a drum stool. Hall's equipment case provides sufficient support, he said.

For someone who was once spoiled under the tutelage of Ray McKinley and the Glenn Miller Band, sitting on an uncomfortable drum case seems inappropriate. Except for K-State's Steve Hall — he's happy wherever he is.

Consumers should consider costs before selecting checking account

(Editor's note: This is the fourth of a series of articles written by members of the K-State Consumer Relations Board to educate readers on topics of consumer interest as part of National Consumer Week this week.)

When selecting a checking account, consumers should consider many aspects before making a decision. Although this article deals with banks, savings and loan institutions may also offer reduced rates for saving and checking plans. The following are some points that could make a difference:

1. Opening minimum deposit.

Different types of checking accounts require different minimum deposits and minimum balances.

2. Service charges. Service charges vary drastically from one type of account to another. It is important to know what the bank's service charge is.

3. Charge per debit. This also varies from bank to bank and from account to account. For those who write a large number of checks, this could make a big difference in the type of account they may choose to have.

4. Location of bank. If the consumer doesn't have a means of transportation, the location of the bank also should be considered.

5. Debit cards or 24-hour bank teller cards. This is a fast and convenient way of doing banking business. However, consumers should be aware of the service charges for each debit because they could add up fast.

The chart below provides information about the checking services offered by Manhattan banks.

Utility's possible bankruptcy could affect entire industry

By The Associated Press

CONCORD, N.H. — If the Seabrook nuclear power plant were to drag its main owner into bankruptcy court, the initial shock would be stunning and the after-effects would be likely to contaminate the environment for years.

The potential victims are many, including electricity users thousands of miles away who might never give a thought to the events in New Hampshire that are shaking the public utilities industry.

Construction at Seabrook stopped last week, with $2.6 billion already spent and both units unfinished.

Public Service Company of New Hampshire, the state's largest electric utility and the main owner of Seabrook, is drowning in unpaid bills from the stalled nuclear power project and says it might have to file for bankruptcy-law protection.

"A bankruptcy by one utility would affect the whole industry," said Mark Luftig, a Wall Street utilities analyst. "It would make capital more expensive for everyone."

It would be the first major electric utility to go to bankruptcy court since the Great Depression, setting a precedent that makes some in the industry shudder.

"Investors have long memories," Luftig said.

"It'll be a long time before anyone forgets," agreed Daniel Rudakas, assistant vice president of Duff and Phelps Co. of Chicago. "I would think it would last the lifetime of an investor. A Depression-era investor talks in much different terms than somebody brought up after World War II. Investors who never experienced this are learning a lesson."

Investors have pinned their faith on state regulatory commissions to keep even crippled utilities alive. That unwritten protection, according to Luftig, is the trade-off for getting smaller returns than those offered by more speculative investments. The faith has been well founded.

"Utility commissions to date have always kept them going; even if they were bleeding, they kept them going," said Michael Foley, director of financial analysis for the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners. "No state commission has been so harsh on a utility to put them into bankruptcy."

Even General Public Utilities of Pennsylvania, owners of Three Mile Island, are "making something of a comeback" with the help of ratepayers, Foley said.

But help has not been forthcoming in New Hampshire to help the Seabrook owners pay for the two unfinished units at the power project.

Facing a critical shortage of cash, the company last week shut down

Seabrook construction, stopped paying its construction bills, laid off 5,850 workers, eliminated its May dividend payment to common stockholders and — according to Luftig — became the first electric utility ever to fail to pay its dividend to preferred stockholders. The company says its actions have allowed it to put off filing for bankruptcy-law protection.

Since 1979, the New Hampshire Public Utilities Commission has been severely limited in its ability to provide Seabrook rate relief to Public Service Co. That year the Legislature passed a law saying consumers couldn't be billed in advance for any costs of unfinished generating plants.

Some blame New Hampshire's politicians for putting the utility in an untenable financial position.

"The politicians have a responsibility to the whole country on this," said Richard Braatz, vice president of finance for the Edison Electric Institute, whose 200 members are investor-owned utilities that supply the country with 75 percent of its electricity.

But Mary Chambers, a Democratic state representative who was the main sponsor of the 1979 law, said in an interview Thursday that she still thinks the law is "absolutely a good law...I think all along there were serious judgmental mistakes made by the company."

Drake, Nike competition next for 'Cat track teams

Individual competition is the main concern for the K-State men's and women's track squads as once again the squads will split while competing in two meets this weekend.

Most of the men will compete at the Drake Relays in Des Moines, Iowa, on Saturday and Sunday, while most of the women will travel to Norman, Okla., to participate in the Nike Invitational on Saturday.

Five members of the women's squad however will travel with the men to Des Moines. Participants include Deb Pihl in the 1,500-meter run; Anne Stadler in the 800-meter run; Pinkie Suggs in both the shot put and discus; Rita Graves in the high jump; and Betsy Silzer in the 5,000-meter run. The men who will compete in Norman are Ray Hansen in the javelin and Brian Howie in the hurdles.

Head track coach Steve Miller said that the Wildcat track squads have been plagued by a "tremendous rash of injuries." This week, Jacques Struckhoff joins the list of injured athletes. Struckhoff has a bruised heel and her ability to compete in the remaining season is doubtful. Other injured Wildcats include Mike Rogers, Veryl Switzer and Ken Harrison. Harrison has been able to compete, but his ability has been limited.

The combination of injuries and seven straight weeks of rain leaves Miller frustrated.

"In my 20 years of coaching, I have never seen anything like this," Miller said. "The kids have been working very hard during the week in fairly good weather, then during weekend competition, when it is raining, they just can't put forth their best effort."

"I'm happy that Drake is the last of the relay circuit. They haven't been much help to us," he added. "I'm anxious to get preparation underway for the Big Eight Outdoor (conference)."

So far during the outdoor season only Pihl and Julie Waage have qualified for nationals. Pihl had a qualifying run of 4:19.00 in the 1,500-meter run on April 7 and Waage threw the javelin 165 feet on April 14, surpassing the qualifying mark. For the men, Ray Hansen is the only national qualifier, who earned his trip to nationals with a throw of 260-feet-10 in the javelin on March 31.

"Money, money, money...it's a rich man's world."

This lyric from a song by the popular rock group "Abba" wasn't written after group members viewed an athletic budget for a National Collegiate Athletic Association member school, but it easily could have been.

An athletic budget at an average NCAA Division I school can be expected to be anywhere from $3.5 to $4 million. K-State's budget for the 1983-84 fiscal year came in at the top of this range. The Wildcat athletic budget for the year was $3.81 million.

Where does the money come from and where does it go? A few figures released by Conrad Colbert, associate director of athletics, provide the answer.

K-State derives its athletic budget from several sources, the most lucrative being season ticket sales for Wildcat athletic events. Season ticket sales accounted for $1.3 million of the total athletic revenue during the prior fiscal year.

Individual game receipts accounted for the second largest source of revenue — $730,000.

Contributions from alumni and revenue derived through membership in the Big Eight Conference also provide the K-State program with a great deal of its total revenue.

Contributions accounted for $600,000 of the total revenue, while conference membership and benefits, which include television and bowl game receipts, accounted for $500,000 of the figure.

The state of Kansas is also a major contributor to K-State athletics. State funding accounted for $350,000 of the total revenue for the 1983-84 fiscal year.

Two categories that could be considered minor, if a six-figure amount can be considered minor, are the net guarantees and the "other" categories. Net guarantees ac-

Costly uniforms

The cost to equip a K-State football player is slightly more than $100 compared to suiting a Wildcat cager, and nearly $200 more than the cost of outfitting a 'Cat baseball player. The figures above show the exact cost to provide uniforms and equipment for an athlete in each sport.

Twins place Eisenreich on 15-day disabled list

By The Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Jim Eisenreich of the Minnesota Twins was placed on the 15-day disabled list Thursday to undergo treatment for a nervous disorder that has plagued him since he entered major league baseball two years ago.

"He had been getting along fine, but he's been very sluggish," said Tom Mee, Twins public relations director. "He's been very slow with the bat. We feel that the medication (Eisenreich is currently taking) is not the answer."

Eisenreich, 25, will undergo treatment as an outpatient at a Minneapolis-area hospital. The nervous disorder, which causes muscle twitching and hyperventilation, prompted him to temporarily quit baseball last season.

"We're going to have him undergo a new course of treatment," said Mee. "I think it's a therapy type of thing." As for the outfielder's return, he said: "We're optimistic, but we're far from confident."

Eisenreich was batting .259 with 27 at-bats, two RBI and two stolen bases.

The Twins called up left-handed pitcher Ed Hodge from their Toledo farm team to replace him. Hodge has a 2-0 record in three starts.

Eisenreich got off to a good start as a rookie in 1982, playing well in the field and batting .303 in 34 games. But he was hospitalized in May for treatment of the disorder and sat out the rest of the season.

He tried a brief comeback last year, appearing in only two games before he went on the voluntary retired list May 27. He returned to his home in St. Cloud, Minn., about 65 miles northwest of Minneapolis, and played both amateur baseball and softball.

During the off-season, he sought help from Chicago hypnotist Harvey Misel, who has treated other athletes.

Manager Billy Gardner said the team is hopeful that Eisenreich will be able to return to the lineup.

"We decided to do it now so he'll be with us the rest of the season," Gardner said. "He wants to play and we want him to play. He gets along with everybody. He had no problems."

Eisenreich could not be reached for comment. He has previously declined to talk with reporters.

"I'm pulling for him," said catcher Tim Lardner. "I hope that he can make it. The club is behind him."

"He seems to have all the talent in the world. He can hit, he can run, he can field," Lardner said. "I hope he keeps battling. He's a good guy. He really is."

Blue Grass victor gears for May 5 Classified

By The Associated Press

LEXINGTON, Ky. — William F. Lucas of Louisville, who had been going to the Kentucky Derby since 1919, should have more than a rooting interest when the famed race is run May 5 at Churchill Downs. He owns Taylor's Special, who Thursday won the $181,050 Blue Grass Stakes at Keeneland.

"It's a wonderful thrill," the 73-year-old Lucas said of the strong possibility of having his first starter in the Derby.

Trainer Bill Mott said Taylor's

Special, who also won the Louisiana Derby, will go to the post in the Kentucky Derby.

However, jockey Pat Day, who gave Taylor's Special a thoroughly professional ride in guiding the colt home by 3½ lengths over stretch-running Silent King, might not be on him May 5. Day is committed to ride Vanlandingham, a colt that due to illness hasn't raced since March 31 and may be scratched from the Derby.

"I thought that was one of his strongest races yet," said the 30-year-old Mott after Taylor's Special won his fifth race in six starts. "He's shown improvement over his last three races and he looked strong."

"We didn't feel pressured any part of it," said Day, who put Taylor's Special into the lead on the backstretch. "We were well within himself all of the way."

Silent King, who was 14 lengths back with little more than three-eighths of a mile to go, closed in to place, finishing 2½ lengths in front of Charmed Rook, an 80-1 longshot.

"He ran fast and I think he deserves a chance to run in the Kentucky Derby," said jockey Bill Shoemaker, looking for his seventh Blue Grass victory, "and if they want me, I'll ride him back."

Uniform

women's golf programs were both listed at $12,000.

The figures are mind-boggling, but what do they mean in terms of the players we see run on to the field or court each season?

It costs the athletic department $317 to outfit one Wildcat football player from head to toe.

The helmet and shoulder pads are by far the most expensive items, costing $85 and $80 respectively.

Shoes, a jersey and a pair of pants are the three next most expensive items. A pair of shoes costs $50, the jersey costs $40 and the pants are $35 per pair.

The pads that go in those pants comprise a total expenditure of $23. The hip pads cost $15, the thigh pads $5 and the knee pads $3.

The socks each player wears cost $4.

When Coach Jack Hartman's Wildcats take to the court in the late fall, each player will be wearing $213 worth of equipment and clothing.

The shoes each player wears are the most expensive item at $50 per pair.

The jersey, shorts, warm-up top and warm-up pants cost $40 each. The socks account for the remaining $3.

The next time you see a Wildcat take the field at Frank Myers Field, he will be wearing $128 worth of equipment.

The shoes, as is the case with basketball, are the most expensive item at $35.

The pants each player wears cost $30, and the jersey accounts for an additional $25. The batting helmet also costs $25.

The cap costs $8. The stirrup hose and sanitary hose each player wears cost $3 and $2 respectively.

Ryan elected first chairman of new NCAA commission

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — John W. Ryan, president of the University of Indiana, has been elected chairman of the newly created NCAA Presidents' Commission, the NCAA announced Thursday.

Ryan, who was also chosen by the Big Ten conference as its representative to the Commission, will serve a two-year term as chairman of the 44-member body of college chancellors and presidents.

The Commission was created at the NCAA convention last January as an advisory and legislative body to help govern NCAA activities. The Commission will draw up legislation for the annual January convention, and may request projects and research efforts of the NCAA staff in suburban Mission, Kan.

Thirty-one of the Commission members were elected through mail ballot by all chief executive officers of NCAA-member schools. Four were elected by Division I-AA football regions, and the nine Division I-A conferences each appointed one member.

Ryan was chosen president in a mail ballot by Commission members.

An NCAA spokesman said Thursday it is uncertain when the Commission will hold its first meeting this summer. Still to be elected are chairmen of the Divisions I, II and III subcommittees of the Commission.

"Presidents are very busy people and we'll have to pick a date when we can be assured of a quorum within each division as well as the entire Commission," said Ted Tow, assistant executive director of the NCAA. "Right now, it looks like it could be the second half of the summer, although we're not able to be certain of that."

The NCAA did not release the vote count or other nominees for Commission chairman.

"Eight were originally nominated and balloting was conducted," Tow said. "The top three vote-getters on that ballot were recirculated to the Commission members, and President Ryan was elected."

Ryan has been president of Indiana since 1971 and is a past chairman of the Association of American Universities.

Paraplegic physician recovers

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Dr. Albert Sabin, noted developer of an anti-polio vaccine, said Thursday he has "made a remarkable, though not yet complete recovery from a nearly fatal extensive paralytic illness" he suffered last year.

He did not name the illness in testifying to a House Veterans Affairs subcommittee, but identified it in a previous interview as polynitis, a neurological disorder.

Sabin said that during the months he lay dependent on others, "I came to appreciate more than ever before the plight of the many thousands who became paraplegics or quadriplegics each year following injuries to the spinal cord and who then remain paralyzed for the rest of their life."

It is estimated that about 200,000 persons in the United States have persistent paraplegia or quadriplegia caused by injury to the spinal cord and about 10,000 additional persons are paralyzed each year.

Sabin said it is not just a problem for the Veterans Administration, "but rather a national problem and the research that must be carried out is a national responsibility."

He said more research is needed on what can be done during the first hours after injury to prevent the development of subsequent permanent paralysis, "especially since in most instances the spinal cord is only bruised and not severed."

He also called for more studies to determine whether anything can "ultimately be done for those paraplegics and quadriplegics past the acute phase to restore the interrupted nerve tracts in the spinal cord to a point of normal function."

Dr. Stephen G. Waxman, chief of neurology service for the VA, told the subcommittee that researchers could expect some functional recovery after spinal cord injury.

Student demonstrators protest interviews

By The College Press Service

The Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) is making a new push to recruit college students this spring, according to reports from a number of campus and CIA sources, but not without some student protests and demonstrations against the agency's policies and operations.

In recent interviews, CIA officials have said their campus visits have been happy affairs that differed dramatically from the huge demonstrations they encountered a decade ago.

Things got so bad then that many campuses asked the CIA not to recruit on college grounds. A few campuses actually banned agency recruiting for awhile.

This is the first spring the agency has gone out of its way to publicize its recruiting efforts.

The results haven't always been as peaceful as the CIA portrays.

At the University of Illinois recently, for instance, about 500 people attended a presentation by four CIA agents — two of them former Illinois students — touting the benefits of CIA life.

The crowd, responding to three full-page ads in the Daily Illini, was a combination of serious job applicants, curiosity seekers and about 70 protestors, university officials reported.

Likewise, recent CIA recruitment seminars at Stanford, once a center of the student movement, drew over 120 career-oriented students along with 20 protestors from the Stanford Central American Action Network (SCAAN).

And several weeks ago, about a dozen students seized the career planning center at Wesleyan University to oppose on-campus CIA interviews being conducted there.

Although dozens of students showed up to apply for the 16 interview slots the CIA had scheduled, the protestors succeeded in turning away several student interviewees before school officials issued warnings against physically blocking students from attending the interviews.

The CIA campus recruitment drive is part of a new effort to replace the last generation of CIA workers, many of whom are approaching retirement age, CIA publicist Dale Peterson said.

The sizable student interest in CIA openings stems from a new-found sense of patriotism following American military exploits in Beirut and Grenada, coupled with a tight job market this spring, Peterson said.

And despite some well-organized protests, the CIA is labeling its campus talent search a success.

"The recruiting effort has been highly successful so far," said CIA spokeswoman Pat Volz, with the agency's headquarters in MacLean, Va.

"We've had a fairly active early spring," she said, and agency recruiters are continuing to visit campuses nationwide in search of students "interested in staying on" with a career in the intelligence-gathering industry.

"People's perception of the agency has changed in the last 10 years," Volz said she thinks, as "the entire world situation" calls people's attention to the need for a strong intelligence network.

But many campus protestors don't see it that way.

"The vast majority of (the CIA's) resources are going to support other things (besides intelligence-gathering) which I don't see as legitimate at all," said Stanford graduate student Steve Babb, one of the 20 SCAAN members who demonstrated against the CIA's recent recruitment drive there.

Babb and the other protestors wanted their arguments against the CIA heard so students would know about "some of the very unsavory things that they have done and are currently doing" in places like Nicaragua, he said.

Wesleyan protestors, in addition to blockading CIA interviews there, handed out over 200 flyers arguing the agency should not be given university office space to hold the interviews.

And in one of the largest and best-organized anti-CIA demonstrations, University of Illinois students took a similar complaint to Chancellor

John Cribbet, who said he could not bar the recruiters from campus unless the CIA was proven to be an illegal organization.

"Our chancellor is a law professor, and we'd hoped he'd be more attentive to our arguments," said Belden Fields, a political science instructor and one of about 70 People's Alliance on Central America (PACA) members involved in the CIA protest there.

"The CIA presents two different faces" when interviewing on campuses and in their real-life activities, Fields asserted. In fact, he charged, "they have broken both U.S. and international law, (and) have spied on U.S. campuses and on academicians abroad."

Protests and demonstrations aside, though, the CIA is happy with its new campus recruitment drive, Volz said.

When compared to the total number of students interviewed, she said, "They (the protests) have been very, very small in scope."

The agency will gather about 150,000 student applications this year, mostly from college grads, for an undisclosed number of job openings, she said.

Kassebaum backs proposal to delay companies' merger

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sen. Nancy Kassebaum has introduced legislation that would delay final government approval of oil company mergers until all assets deemed to cause antitrust problems have been sold.

The measure, identical to one already proposed in the House, would have the effect of preventing the merger of Texaco and Getty oil companies until Getty's refinery at El Dorado has been sold to a new operator.

"I agree that these mergers are not necessarily harmful, but I feel we need more information," said Kassebaum, R-Kan., who is up for re-election this year.

"My concern here is that we have no way of knowing in advance whether the remedy sought by the (Federal Trade Commission) — divestiture — will be effective or not. If it should be impossible to sell the assets in question, it really would be too late to stop the merger," she said in a Senate floor speech.

She said the measure would "restore some sanity" to the government's review process for major mergers.

Warden favors prison reform

By LILLIAN ZIER
Collegian Reporter

Americans' love of violence and its presence in homes, movies and on television has contributed to the high level of societal crime in the United States, Midge Carroll said at Friday's KSU Convocation in McCain Auditorium.

She is the first woman in the United States to be warden of a men's state prison. The institution she is responsible for, the California Institute for Men in Chino, Calif., has 4,600 inmates, employs 1,350 people and has a budget of $58 million.

Carroll, originally from Newton, said she reached her position as warden through the civil service system and through interviews.

Carroll spoke about violence in the United States and its effects on American society.

The Chino prison was built to hold only 2,600 inmates. There are two inmates in each cell, in storage rooms, closets and 210 more sleep on the gym floor.

Carroll said this situation presents a dilemma: "Do you release some (prisoners) early, or do you over-crowd the prisons?"

She said that when criminals are committed to prisons, they continue to rob, rape and use narcotics.

"When you reduce the level of living, you increase their frustration and their opportunity to commit more crimes," she said. "You also increase their opportunities to escape. The buildings fall apart. Inmates abuse equipment; they vandalize property."

"Once the prison is full, what do you do with them? Idle inmates mean trouble. We have inmates washing clean windows and sweeping clean floors just to keep them busy."

Carroll blamed the rise in the crime rate on Americans' love of violence.

"We are proud of it, practice it and glorify it," she said.

She said 50 percent of all women will be battered sometime in their lives. Fifty to 60 percent of all marriages contain some violence. Eighty percent of all prisoners have been subjected to physical and sexual assault in their childhoods.

"Last year, 106 deaths were attributed to child abuse in California. Children in turn react with rage and violence. We bombard children with violence in music, movies and television. Televised violence teaches the 'how to,'" she said.

Carroll said minorities are over-represented in prisons. In California, 64 percent of the men in prisons are minorities.

"After working 20 years in prisons, no one goes out a better, nicer person. Prisons are a temporary solution. Prisons give a false sense of protection. Most come out meaner and smarter."

Carroll made several suggestions for changing the destructive pattern of the prison system. To relieve some of the overcrowding, she said non-violent offenders on their first offense should pay a restitution or be made to work for the city, county, or state rather than going to prison.

On the second offense, they should be evaluated to see if their sentences could be shortened. She said all prisoners should be required to have a driver's license, a social security card, job skills and interview skills before they are released.

"Most fail in the first three to four months after release because they do not have skills to survive," she said.

She said Americans must focus their attention on their children — teaching them rules and making them feel like worthy human beings. She said television should be censored and movie rankings should be more strict.

Carroll said she believes in the death penalty with reservations.

"I have seen people who have committed crimes so hideous they must be punished," she said.

Drinking age issue dies in final session

The Kansas Legislature ended its 1984 session with no action on raising the drinking age for 3.2 beer.

Thursday the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee recommended the drinking age issue be tabled for the session and studied during the summer. However, senators had the option of adopting an earlier conference committee report recommending the age be increased to 19.

The Associated Students of Kansas lobbying organization was one of the main groups working for the defeat of proposals aimed at raising the drinking age. Brett Lambert, K-State ASK campus director, said passage of a higher drinking age seemed a certainty at the beginning of the legislative session.

"At the beginning, there was no question it (the drinking age) was going up," he said. "The beer wholesalers were trying to hold the increase to age 19. We were the only group which stayed with it (trying to maintain the drinking age at 18)."

Many people thought the drinking age issue was dead after the Federal and State Affairs Committee recommendation, Lambert said.

"It could have still gone to 19," he said. "I thought it (the conference committee report) would come up (for consideration by the Senate) Friday afternoon, but it didn't. It still hadn't come up when the Saturday session ended at 2 a.m. Sunday, I was scared that if it (debate) went into today (Sunday) we would lose because they would have enough time to debate."

The drinking age question did not come to the floor Sunday, the final day of the senate wrap-up session, because it lacked the votes to pass, he said.

The drinking age bills are dead for now, Lambert said.

Tornadoes, rain batter Midwest

Manhattan escapes severe weather, receives downpours

From Staff and Wire Reports

While tornadoes and severe thunderstorms were occurring over most of eastern Kansas during the weekend, Manhattan was receiving another in a series of downpours, but there were no threatening conditions.

A spokesman for the National Weather Service office in Topeka said 1.31 inches of rain fell between 7 a.m. and 1 p.m. Sunday at Tuttle Creek Reservoir. Tornado watches, which were posted throughout most of the day and into the night, covered most of the surrounding counties but did not include Riley County.

At least 15 tornadoes and numerous funnel clouds rambled across southern and southeast Kansas on Sunday, tearing roofs off buildings, breaking windows and downing tree limbs and power lines.

Only one minor injury was reported, although two people were killed in a southwest Kansas traffic accident that the state Highway Patrol blamed on a wet highway.

An Arkansas City woman who went to her door to watch the sky suffered lacerations when the door suddenly burst open and she was sucked outside.

At least 10 tornadoes were counted in Sedgwick County, including two in Wichita, said Gregory Mills, emergency communications coordinator.

Twisters also were reported in Butler County, Arkansas City, Welda, Cambridge and Caney.

Spotters for Butler County counted seven funnel clouds, and police in Wichita had reports of five funnels.

"One of our spotters told us of one (funnel) that had four tails hanging down from it over Wichita," said Gene Beaver, Civil Preparedness Coordinator for Sedgwick County.

The first tornado to hit Wichita struck a trailer park in the northwest part of the city, ripping the end off one trailer and damaging several others, fire officials said.

The second twister touched down only briefly about two hours after the first, and no serious damage was reported, a Civil Preparedness spokesman said.

"We were standing out watching the clouds move in, and it went north of our house," said Pat Oburg, a resident of the trailer park. "We've got those big pine trees, and you just hear the noise of a big tornado coming in. We started to go

Student Senate allocations exceed projected budget at semester's final session

By PAUL ENGLIS
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate has tentatively allocated $2,056.74 more than the comptroller's office projects it will receive from student fees next year.

Senators voted to fund the additional spending with money from Student Governing Association reserve accounts. The final night of consideration on the allocation bill introduced by senate's Finance Committee concluded just before 3 a.m. Friday.

In an effort to balance the budget, Catherine Saylor, veterinary medicine senator, proposed an amendment to cut the Recreational Services line item from Finance Committee's recommendation of $2.50 for full-time students and 75 cents for part-time students to $2.40 for full-time students and 70 cents for part-time students. The amendment failed, and the committee's recommendation was accepted.

This line item reduction would have yielded more than $3,000. Because rec services has a large contingency fund, it can afford the funding cut, Saylor said.

"We (Student Senate) have a $750,000 budget to work with. We're supposed to keep $40,000 in reserves, we only have about $20,000 in there now. Rec services has a $75,000 budget, they have $30,000 in reserves. In addition to that, they are going to add $2,185 to their contingency fund next year," she said. "If you look at what program can most take a cut, I think this is a program that can."

Kay Deever, education senator, said cutting the line item was unfair because it required rec services to pay for senate's overspending.

"One of the main points that has come out is that we should not cut the last few groups simply because we are down," she said. "So here we are on the last night on the last group and we are shaving the money off of rec services because they have it and we need it."

Because rec services is a major line item, it cannot request increases in funding except at the time of its three-year review, Kirk Porteous, Finance Committee chairman, said. Cutting funds for a major line item would hinder the group's planning.

"Line items are not like other programs. They have multiple sources of income and multiple expenses. You review them every three years and not in between. They have to plan on hard money for two to three years," he said. "If we're going to come here in times that are a little tough and say we're going to cut rec services, they can't plan ahead."

Brian O'Neill, graduate senator, supported cutting the rec services line item because he said some action was needed to balance the budget.

"I have never seen a budget floating in so much red ink as I have seen this budget so far. This may be the last night, but we have got to pay the bill sometime, and that time starts right now," he said.

The Reserves for Maintenance of Standing Programs account is not to be used to balance tentative allocations, O'Neill said. He said it was established to be used in situations when revenue falls below what was projected.

Former Finance Committee chairman Mark Terri, junior in finance, said the comptroller's office doesn't know how many students will attend K-State next year, so the amount of money available is not yet known.

"You're not exactly sure how much you're going to have to spend, so I don't think you have to worry about paying the bills until final allocations when the money is there," he said. "Technically you are in debt, but realistically you are not. You don't know how much money you've got to spend yet."

Kendra Ponte, arts and sciences senator, said cutting rec services' budget would not represent the wishes of the students.

"We've been crucified by the media for our lack of concern and our lack of responsibility in the allocations we've done already," she said. "If we vote to support this amendment, you will hear the largest outcry from the students because they will be more misrepresented and more ignored in this amendment than in anything we've done yet."

International Coordinating Council and Early Childhood Laboratory's allocations were reconsidered with no additional funding being awarded. ICC received $3,506.46 and Early Childhood Laboratory was not funded.

ICC requested $544.50 for advertising, an increase from the $346.50 previously allocated.

Bruce Ney, agriculture senator, said senators should vote according to the guidelines established by Finance Committee.

"I get real tired of groups that suddenly appear with all this information for Student Senate that they didn't bring for Finance Committee," Ney said. "I think Student Senate has realized the pressure put upon it by this group from the publicity it has received, and I don't think a peace offering is in order."

O'Neill criticized Finance Committee for not explaining allocation guidelines to the groups, and blamed this lack of knowledge for the problems senate experienced with advertising requests.

Reagan signs pact on nuclear energy with China

By The Associated Press

PEKING — President Reagan ends a year-long chill in cultural relations and opens the door for U.S. nuclear energy sales to China in a signing ceremony today, but differences over Taiwan cast a shadow as he prepared to leave for Shanghai.

The president and his wife, Nancy, took Sunday off to visit the ancient capital of Xian to see the 2,200-year-old site where an army of terra cotta soldiers was unearthed in 1974 near the tomb of China's first emperor.

After the signing and farewell ceremonies in Peking today, the Reagans were to fly to Shanghai for an overnight stay highlighted by a tour of a joint U.S.-Chinese industrial plant and a visit to students and faculty at Fudan University.

Peking's complaints about U.S. arms sales to Taiwan, the offshore capitalist republic that claims to be the true government of China, intruded before the presidential party flew to Xian.

At a meeting with Secretary of State George P. Shultz, Chinese Foreign Minister Wu Xueqian said

Washington is not reducing weapons sales to Taiwan fast enough and called for an "urgent solution."

In an ABC-TV interview, Shultz rejected the complaint and said the sales were "one way to be sure" the Communist Chinese did not invade the island.

Two days earlier, Premier Zhao Ziyang asked Reagan for a "considerable" reduction and early cessation of arms sales.

Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping was quoted Sunday as saying his summit with Reagan was very good and should boost economic ties.

But the Communist Party general secretary, Hu Yaobang, meeting with a Japanese political leader, quoted Deng as adding that Taiwan was the "root cause" of continuing differences with Washington and Sino-U.S. relations had not reached maturity.

The initialing today of an agreement on nuclear energy cooperation could have a dramatic effect on bilateral trade, which totaled $4.4 billion last year.

Under negotiation since 1981, the agreement would permit American manufacturers such as Westinghouse and General Electric to compete for billions of dollars in reactor and component contracts.

Energy-short China plans to have 10,000 megawatts of nuclear power by the year 2000.

The agreement was delayed by Chinese reluctance to seek U.S. consent before transferring or reprocessing nuclear material.

The pact was secured as the president arrived last Thursday, and Reagan was to witness the initialing by U.S. Ambassador Arthur Hum-

Campus news briefs

Students picked for U.N. semester

Sandra Deyoe, freshman in modern languages, and Virgil Wiebe, sophomore in political science, have accepted invitations to participate in the United Nations Honors Semester this fall.

Thirty students were selected in a national competition for the program sponsored by the National Collegiate Honors Council and hosted by Long Island University.

Participants will earn 15 semester hours of credit in courses emphasizing international studies and have extensive involvement in United Nations activities. Both students are members of the K-State Arts and Sciences Honors Program.

Ambassadors to represent K-State

K-State will have representatives in Puerto Rico, thanks to efforts of several current students who will head home in May.

Puerto Rican students Victor Collazo, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine; Maritza Segarra, senior in pre-law; Cherryl Ortiz, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine; and Jose Cortes, senior in microbiology, and the K-State offices of Admissions and Minority Affairs have established a Puerto Rican Student Ambassador program.

There are about 150 students from Puerto Rico currently attending K-State; however, there is a lack of information about K-State in Puerto Rico and no formal recruiting program.

The four students have completed an orientation program focusing on academic programs of the eight K-State colleges, new student programs, admissions, minority affairs, financial aid, housing and other general information about K-State. The student ambassadors will disseminate the information in Puerto Rico to aid potential students.

Professor to show fast math skills

Bill Parker, associate professor of mathematics, will present his demonstration and discussion of rapid mental calculation at 2:30 p.m. Tuesday in Cardwell 102.

Using secrets of mental arithmetic and algorithms of Vedic mathematics, Parker is able to perform feats of addition, multiplication, root taking, decimalizing, elementary algebra and calendar reckoning.

Student to study design in Paris

Trina Cole, senior in apparel design, has been accepted to attend the Paris Fashion Institute Summer Session.

She will receive instruction from some of the world's most famous designers.

Cole was required to submit a resume of activities and honors, portfolios and personal statistics to be accepted.

This year she won a first and fifth place at the Kansas City Fashion Groups annual competition and the "Most Creative" award at the K-State Apparel Design Portfolio Show.

Shelley West, country music performer, is reviewing Cole's designs for her concert wardrobe.

Plan may ease greek, neighbor tension

By LEE WHITE
Manhattan Editor

Five members of a public relations and advertising campaigns class — all of whom are members of greek chapters — have formulated a plan they hope will alleviate bad feelings between University greeks and their neighbors. They outlined the proposal on Friday to the class and officers of the K-State and Riley County police departments.

The plan, called Cooperation for a Complete Neighborhood, is a project for the class taught by Nancy Hause, temporary assistant professor of journalism and mass communications. The students plan to present the project to leaders of the greek community, said Jay Baumann, senior in journalism and mass communications.

"We had to gear the project to each house because neighbors don't always know about Greek Affairs," said Doug Barton, junior in journalism and mass communications. "They only care that the big, brick house down the street is making noise."

The project employs brochures, letterheads and buttons with the campaign slogan and calls for extensive use of the local media to increase understanding of the greek system.

To define the problem and its severity, the group undertook surveys of the greek neighborhoods, chapter presidents and greek systems at the other Kansas Board of Regents schools and Washburn University, Bob Becker, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, said. The surveys indicated that the two biggest problems are noise and parking, and that while other universities experience similar problems, they are not as serious as the ones at K-State, he said.

Part of the problem, group members said, is the lack of interaction between the greeks and their neighbors. This could be changed if greeks would conduct open houses, neighborhood beautification days and social functions with guest speakers who would discuss ways certain situations could be improved, Tom Fay, junior in journalism and mass communications, said.

By inviting neighbors into the houses and even providing personal escorts to make them feel welcome, the group hopes to increase neighborhood awareness that the greeks are "all human and have the same types of interests" as neighbors, Jennifer Zang, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, said. Some residents aren't even aware that greek houses are on their blocks, she said.

The group also proposed establishment of neighborhood councils and chapter police and parking representatives. The councils would serve as forums for greeks and non-greeks to agree on neighborhood policies.

Police representatives would be responsible for notifying the RCPD of upcoming social functions at the houses and telephone numbers of those in charge of the parties. Parking representatives would monitor members' parking and keep records that would be passed to subsequent representatives for the sake of continuity.

Barton said no figures have been compiled on the costs of such a program. He added, however, that the cost of producing the class project was minimal and should not be a hindrance to individual houses that would be responsible for funding.

"It's at their disposal," he said. "As of this point, it's in their hands."

Gunshot hits student in chest

Andrew Vikman, freshman in geology, was accidentally shot in the chest Saturday night as he descended the stairs to the firing range in the Military Science Building.

Vikman, who is being treated at The St. Mary Hospital, said in a telephone interview Sunday that he was shot in the upper right chest and that the doctors have yet to determine whether they will operate to remove the bullet.

"They (the doctors) need to find out about internal bleeding. My lung was a little collapsed, and when I take a deep breath it hurts. But, I feel a lot better than I did on Saturday night," he said.

The name of the person who discharged the .22-caliber rifle has not been disclosed by the K-State Police Department.

Parachutist injured in exhibition accident

A K-State student was injured Saturday afternoon at CCo Park during an exhibition by the K-State Skydivers Club for the Area III Special Olympics regional track meet.

Jim McChesney, senior in physical therapy and president of the skydiving club, landed on his back after his exhibition jump and was admitted to The St. Mary Hospital for a compressed vertebra.

McChesney said a technical problem with the parachute on deployment caused him to miss his target.

The problem was a suspension line which broke off the canopy and caused the canopy to stall on landing. He said the canopy serves as an airflow mechanism, similar to those on airplanes.

McChesney is in stable to satisfactory condition and is expected to be released today.

House offers drug abusers chance to build family bonds

By SUZANNE LARKIN
Staff Writer

Within a large yellow brick structure, 11 men are working and striving toward a better life.

The Flinthills Inn, established in July of 1980, is a halfway house in Grandview Plaza near Junction City designed to help rehabilitate men with alcohol and other drug abuse problems.

In 1980 the capacity of this two-story house was 18, with six residents. Now, the capacity is 20 and there are 11 men living in what is one of the few halfway houses in Kansas.

"There are only 12 or so halfway houses or reintegration programs in Kansas," said Dale Denney, administrative and clinical director of the Inn.

"Since I took over a year ago, we have undergone probably more changes than ever in the four year history of the Inn.

"We have hired some new staff and clinical personnel and there are ongoing improvements being done to the interior and exterior of the house. We are also hiring a secretary who we will all depend on a great deal," he said.

All residents of the Inn are taken through referrals from social services and medical institutions that deal with the chemically dependent.

Once the referral is accepted, the resident is provided with personal and group counseling services through the Inn supervisor, counselors and resident assistants. A majority of these people are recovering abusers, which helps the residents because they share a common interest with the counselors, Denney said.

As supervisor, Denney deals with a vast array of situations.

"Because we don't have a clinical person yet, I deal with various non-administrative problems including people who are having trouble living within the structure of the house, making sure residents sign up for meals ahead of time, or even that they make their beds. Dealing with depression or the situation when someone wants to use a drug, constitutes yet another area of some of the problems I must face," he said.

The treatment philosophy is determined to a great extent by Alcoholics Anonymous and Narcotics Anonymous, Denney said.

"We subscribe wholeheartedly to those programs and we utilize the principles of these programs in what we do here. Our greatest expectation is that the residents remain drug free," Denney said.

A drawback to the Inn, he added, is that it only offers services to men.

"We just don't have the facilities to be a co-ed facility, but I wish we were. It would add another dimension to our program.

"It is hard to make the Inn a family atmosphere because of the turnover rate. It takes a lot of energy to do that, and we are extremely short staffed here, but it's coming along. And everyone is really making an effort," Denney said.

Participation in house activities and projects helps in building the Inn's family bonds.

"I am trying to get the guys to give a little bit of themselves, be it by cleaning up a bit, or even by doing some painting. We have even worked out a trade-off with the YMCA in town. We do some fix-up jobs in return for the use of the facilities. It has been really good for the guys and I have seen a big change in attitude and with involvement."

Sobriety, the emphasis of the rehabilitation program, encompasses work, encouragement and incentive.

Dennis Beitz, service manager of alcohol and drug services for Pawnee Mental Health Services, is heavily involved with the Inn and also predicts a positive future for the center.

"Every year the head count at the Inn has been up, with 82 percent occupancy in '83. Overall the program has gone very well, with expansion and renovation in process. Funding remains the major issue," Beitz said.

"With this progress, expansion and drive, the success of the program will just fall into place, and with it sobriety will follow."

Regulations increase funding competition

By The College Press Service

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Federally funded education research centers now established at 10 major U.S. universities will be forced to compete with one another and with other colleges across the nation under a new set of regulations proposed by the Department of Education.

But the switch in how the government distributes millions in education research grants, designed to make the funds available to schools that traditionally have been shut out of the program, probably won't bring any new schools into the grant process in practice, some administrators contend.

The 10 centers, along with seven federally funded education research labs, now will compete for the $30 million in funding the department doles out to them each year.

They also will have to design their research to meet federally set priorities, according to department spokesman Don Fischer.

"At the time the centers and labs were established in the mid-1960s, research regulations were not set forth," Fischer said. "They were each funded as long as they continued to perform satisfactory work. Now Congress has directed us to hold open competition for awards and funding."

Essentially, Fischer said, the changes mean the 10 research centers, which are dedicated to serving national research needs, and the seven existing laboratories, which serve regional research needs, will no longer automatically be eligible for federal support.

Among other things, the centers and labs no longer will get to set their own goals for their own research.

Now, the government itself will set the goals and ask colleges to show how they can meet them. Colleges must then show why they can meet them better than other colleges.

The Education Department has drawn up a list of 26 priorities it proposes to ask colleges to meet.

The changes weren't proposed in response to problems with the current regulations.

Congress requested the changes this year to assure that the department is getting the best research for its money.

"There are other institutions and agencies that could possibly operate with as high quality for the same cost. The incumbents have never had any competition."

In addition, certain sections of the country aren't being served by the regional research labs, which have dwindled in number over the last 10 years. The labs, mostly private, non-profit research institutions, will be assigned new territories so that all areas of the nation are covered.

Funding for the centers and labs expires in November 1985, and the regulation changes would affect federal research support for a five-year period starting in 1985 and extending through the end of the decade.

Since Congress established them in 1965, the centers and labs have done extensive research and testing on curriculum development, teacher training and testing procedures, Fischer said.

This program is the largest discretionary grant program awarded by the Department of Education, he said, and has produced projects such as a comprehensive school mathematics program used in public schools, training programs for school board members and special Alaskan Readers for teaching native Alaskan Indians.

Officials at the University of Oregon, the University of California at Los Angeles and Harvard University — where three of the 10 centers operate — say they aren't opposed to the changes, but also question whether they are necessary for a system that already functions smoothly.

Factory raids by officials 'a harassment'

Speaker deplores Hispanic hardships

The Hispanic population in the United States can have a dramatic effect on the 1984 presidential election, Juane Andrade Jr., executive director of Midwest Voter Registration and Education Project, said.

Andrade spoke Friday in the Union Little Theater as part of the Festival Hispano Americano.

The Hispanic population in the United States can influence 75 percent of the electoral votes for the U.S. presidency in the next election, Andrade said. Hispanics in the Midwest can carry 33 percent of the electoral votes in the next election.

"I think that Missouri, Kansas, Iowa and Minnesota represent that penny which will make a dollar," he said. "Every vote is important. Every vote counts. Every Hispanic in the Midwest must register to vote, and they must vote. It will take every single one of us to swing a vote."

Mario Obledo, president of the National League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC), also spoke at the lecture, which was sponsored by the Movimiento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlan (MEChA), the Puerto Rican Student Organization and the Office of Minority Affairs.

The United States has often been guilty of defiling Latin American people living in the United States, he said.

"The Department of Immigration raids factories. It still does this. This is harassment that is directed at Hispanic people. They do not do this to Canadians."

The goals of Hispanics do not differ greatly from those of any other people.

"These people (Hispanics) are here to work, to earn a living, to find happiness in this great country, and it is a great country," Obledo said.

Hispanic people should hold on to their culture, he said.

"People of the Hispanic communities in the United States are proud of their country and of their heritage. And they have fought and died in their country's wars. They are proud of this."

Hispanic-Americans are often ostracized because they speak two languages and listen to different music, Obledo said.

"It has gotten to the point that we (Hispanics) cannot listen to music of our culture without feeling that it's wrong. This is not right," he said.

Obledo said he is convinced of the necessity of action to help Hispanics gain equality.

"At one time I was thinking about getting out of the movement to help the Hispanic people. I was sitting in my living room reading a local newspaper, and I saw a small article at the bottom of the page. It was about a man who drowned. He had been chased down by immigration officials and he had jumped into a river. They had watched the man drown, watched him. He had done nothing against the law," he said. "It was then that I decided that I could not get out of it."

Policy pits cost vs. principle

Discrimination is cruel. Such malefaction is a greater problem when it is sanctioned by a majority.

Thursday night, most of Student Senate voted to favor a proposal by the Lafene Student Health Advisory Committee to eliminate maternity benefits from the student health insurance plan.

Economics was the influential criterion in this decision. The Lafene committee said a policy excluding maternity coverage would save single students buying the insurance $39 a year. Student/spouse rates would be $92.50 less, student/children rates $89.50 lower and student/spouse and children rates $129 cheaper.

But students desiring maternity coverage would instead pay a $400 rider above the cost of the policy.

The Lafene committee said only 5 to 8 percent of all students with the policy used the maternity coverage this year. But the committee's proposal was denounced as discriminatory by Caroline Peine, assistant dean for student development, Dianne Urban, students' attorney, and Dorothy Thompson, director of Affirmative Action at K-State.

Senators were at a disadvantage when making their decision because only a few of them knew of the impending legislation before Thursday night. They had little time to discuss the issue with their constituents and spent more than an hour discussing the bill. Senators learned that 800 fewer policies had been sold since last year, when insurance costs more than doubled. Fearing many students were forced to go without any insurance at all, senate voted in favor of the policy with maternity coverage as a rider, believing it to be in the best interests of the student body to have an overall cheaper policy.

Cost is a very valid concern. University students will always protest the high prices incurred with higher education. But economics is no excuse to practice discrimination, especially at a University that professes to have a policy of non-discrimination.

Any insurance policy that exempts women's special health care considerations from coverage constitutes discrimination. If insurance policies don't cover women's health risks, what should they pay for? Who pays for the cost of other students' accidents or hospital stays?

Why should the insurance policy single out the risks involved with sexual activity and ignore the more obvious risks associated with driving a car or athletic activity, which people still have to pay for whether or not they participate? This attitude especially discriminates against married students.

What is sad is that the majority of senators were perhaps unable to perceive this policy as being discriminatory or chose the cost to students as a more important consideration. But such a policy change is legal because no law exists to prohibit such discrimination.

K-State President Duane Acker has said that he is committed to a policy of non-discrimination, and Charles Hein, director of communications, said K-State will uphold this policy "in any form or any program."

Acker will have the last word in deciding the outcome of the insurance legislation. But whether he considers the 800 students unable to afford health insurance last year as tantamount to the reality of discrimination when making his decision remains to be seen.

Citizens wary of foreign policy

A recent New York Times-CBS News Poll concluded that only one of three Americans supports President Reagan's policies in Central America, and nearly half the people say they are afraid that his policies might lead to war in the area.

According to this poll, Americans were especially uneasy about the American mining of Nicaraguan harbors. The majority of Americans also believe the United States should not help overthrow the current Sandinista government in Nicaragua.

What this poll demonstrates is the overwhelming public apprehension of possible military conflict in an area that most Americans feel is not the United States' responsibility.

Reagan has defended his policies and the presence of U.S. military personnel in Central America by trying to appeal to the American public's sense of patriotism.

"Either we help America's friends defend themselves and give democracy a chance, or we abandon our responsibilities and let the Soviet Union and Cuba shape the destiny of our hemisphere," he said.

As this poll demonstrates, the American public isn't buying Reagan's reasoning. Perhaps the citizenry sees an all too recent parallel in Vietnam, where the United States also saw a responsibility to protect democracy.

Perhaps Americans realize the conflict in Central America has its roots in poverty, and not in the eternal battle between democracy and communism as the Reagan administration would have us believe.

Another disturbing conclusion of the poll is the fact that Americans continue to show little knowledge of the situation in Central America. Only 19 percent of those Americans surveyed could correctly answer that the United States supported the opponents to the Nicaraguan government, and 62 percent said they had not been following the events closely enough to identify which side the United States does support.

If the American public is as concerned about Reagan's policies in Central America as this poll indicates, one would hope that more attention would be focused on this region's politics. Unfortunately, this is not the case.

If polls such as these are to be taken seriously and are to have any effect on the decisions the present administration makes, the American people must make an effort to be informed of the situation and the politics of the region. Only by being informed can the American public make a difference between having a potentially dangerous situation or peace in the region.

Karen Bellus, for the editorial board

Get ready for finals

Finals week. I know of no other phrase which, when uttered, can make a normal, rational college student turn into a jelly.

You've seen it. People who otherwise don't worry about their grades suddenly become very aware of their grade point average. These people also begin calculating their current grades to five digits from the decimal point, looking for a way to keep a 2.0.

Books which haven't been opened since the beginning of the semester are suddenly shown the light of day. Dust is blown off the books — the ones which cost $30 or more, of course — and the glaring white pages shine in the student's eyes mockingly.

Assignments also come back to haunt students. C'mon, you know what I'm talking about. Remember the massive book report (or term paper or lab or research project or whatever) which your professor assigned the first day of class? Remember how you said, "Well, I have all semester to do this. I'll do it over spring break (or Easter)?" Well, the time of reckoning has come.

A change in human behavior also can be noted. A typical college student is a nice person to be around...until it's FINALS WEEK. A metamorphosis then occurs which rivals turning into a werewolf or vampire. Eyes become bloodshot. The whole body becomes tense and tired. The mind sharpens its focus and can't be dissuaded. Sleep, once plentiful, deserts the student, leaving him vulnerable to attacks — both real and imagined.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

Attitudes change. The normally pleasant student turns into a raw nerve. The littlest distractions, which were once overlooked, are now magnified into world-shattering events. Arguments and fights break out over trivial issues such as pencil tapping, whistling and knuckle popping.

The library, once a bastion of silence, becomes crowded with students who are trying to finish last-minute assignments. The books you need to finish your assignment are always the ones which are missing. There isn't any place to sit and you would really rather be at Tuttle instead of in the stacks, working on some dumb assignment.

These changes don't happen to everyone. Some people, especially finals veterans, breeze through finals without a trace of change. You'd swear they'd just started the semester.

Sounds familiar? If it does, you're not alone.

Finals week is tough. Being asked to recall all the information you've learned in a semester in a matter of a few days is difficult. But it should be a learning experience for you.

Granted, few places in the "real world" are going to ask you to recall all the information you learned in Algebra I. All you'll have to do is use the information. It may be as background information, or it may be used every day.

Wishing finals week would go away won't help you get through it. The week will pass, but it won't leave you alone. You might as well prepare yourself for it.

Wishing the University would close is also a false hope. Remember the big winter storm right after spring break?

"We do not close the University ever," said Charles Hein, director of communications, as quoted in the March 20 Collegian. If they wouldn't close the University for one of the worst winter storms in recent history, they sure won't close it because of a tornado, nuclear war or finals week.

The secret to making it through finals week is pacing. Study, but use your time effectively. Leave time for breaks. Take time out for yourself, even if it is only 30 minutes a day.

If you have more than two finals on one day, or two finals scheduled at the same time on the same day, don't panic. University policy allows for only two finals per day, and one final per time slot per day.

If you face the above situation, see your instructors and explain the situation. If this doesn't remedy the situation, then see the department head(s). If this doesn't work, then see the dean of the college(s) involved. A solution will be found.

Hang in there. It'll all be over soon.

Senate debates funds until 3 a.m.

Only an outsider could have said it: "Nothing changed. You spent nine hours and the only difference from the recommendations was to take $400 from MEChA and give it to the International Coordinating Council."

I hadn't assessed our marathon meeting in quite such an unproductive light, but by Friday my brain had zeroed-out. I gave a sigh of resignation and agreed with the KSDB-FM reporter. Perhaps Student Senate's non-action is a credit to the Finance Committee's judgment.

What did senate do in the Union Big Eight Room from 6 p.m. Thursday night until 3 a.m. Friday?

Well, uh, we talked. And when all was said and done we passed the first tentative allocation budget ever to deficit spend. The red ink totals $5,056.74 — $3,500 of which was recommended by Finance Committee, the rest tacked on by senate.

The meeting had its high points. The first recess was called so that a Lafene Student Health Advisory Committee member could phone the Keystone insurance agent to ask if the health insurance plan senate was about to approve covered abortions. The plan does not. The lack of coverage in that instance and in maternity prompted some senators to decide that the lowest cost plan discriminated against women. Senate passed the lowest cost plan 39-12.

CATHERINE SAYLER
Student Senator

Another area of controversy was an amendment to decrease Recreational Services' allocation by $3,100, the amount Sports Club Council received this year. Those favoring the cut pointed to the $30,000 Rec Services saved from past allocations, the $10,000 deductible insurance policy the service carried and the request this year to add $2,185 to the $30,000 fund as justification for the decrease.

Opponents argued that the $30,000 fund has not been earmarked for capital improvements, as had been reported, and the fund would be spent within two years simply to maintain the facility. Opponents also defended the additional $2,185 as a necessary buffer for Rec Services in the years ahead.

The amendment failed 34-17 and the service was granted its original $75,000 request.

In reconsiderations, ICC and the Early Childhood Laboratory were again denied funding. A question arose over the accuracy of the childhood laboratory vote, but after 30 minutes of parliamentary gymnastics, the vote stood 25-26 against funding the child care center.

Where will the deficit money come from? Tentatively, the money will be taken from reserve accounts which heretofore held $17,600. As a rule, senate estimates enrollment lower than actual projections, so when the correct figures are released in the fall, senate has always had a little more money than anticipated. That extra money is distributed in final allocations.

U-LearnN and the Coalition for Human Rights have already announced that they will request funds in the fall. This year, the fall funds will most likely go toward covering the deficit already created.

And for next year? Senators are talking about a fee increase. Senate can either vote directly to increase student fees, or let the student body vote in the form of a referendum. Senate must allow a referendum if petitioned by 10 percent of the student body.

And just to leave everyone something to ponder over the summer, I'll type the word one more time — REFERENDUM.

(Editor's note: Catherine Sayler, junior in veterinary medicine, represents the College of Veterinary Medicine.)

Handicapped parking for disabled only

Editor,
Re: John Markiewicz's column, "Keep parking fines on campus," in the April 20 Collegian:

Regardless of the time or place, handicapped stalls are for the handicapped. These are designed to make it as easy as possible for the handicapped person to maneuver (i.e., room for wheelchair, cut away curb in sidewalks and no gravel).

If you force a handicapped person into a regular stall and a car parks next to him, he may not be able to get out of his wheelchair to his car until the car next to him leaves.

Because of rude, unthinking, inconsiderate, selfish people who don't want to walk an extra 15 to 20 feet, the handicapped person must surmount yet another hardship.

Unfortunately, too many of us forget how lucky we are to be able to walk that 50 feet, one block or a half mile to class while others can't get into buildings, go through doors, go up and down steps, walk in the woods and wade in creeks.

Coalition adds to education

Editor,
I certainly hope Kirk Porteous' Neanderthal mentalite is not indicative of the Student Senate membership. In reference to the Coalition for Human Rights' informational benefit, Porteous claims, "If I want information like they (the coalition) provides, I'll read Newsweek or Time."

If Porteous thinks that he can get everything there is to know out of the pages of a popular magazine, why does he even bother to go to an institution of higher learning?

The truth of the matter is, the coalition provides a broad spectrum of human rights issues and gives students a unique opportunity to hear firsthand accounts from a diverse set of speakers. Members of senate, stop and consider the real purpose of a university education!

Volunteers lend time

In addition to the athletic efforts exerted by competitors, some K-State students and faculty and Manhattan citizens volunteered their time, dedication and a helping hand to participants in the Area III Special Olympics on Saturday.

This year more than 200 volunteers helped with the event in which physically limited people competed in athletic competition. The athletes competed in gymnastics in Ahearn Field House and in field events at Cico Park.

"It's an excellent opportunity to see them having fun succeeding and having some success instead of having difficulties," Debra Engstrom, treasurer for the Manhattan Special Olympics Committee, said.

According to Bob Johnson, director of the Area III Special Olympics, the University and the city of Manhattan are both volunteer oriented.

"I came from a community of 200,000 and we had to beat the bushes for volunteers. But at K-State and Manhattan there is a population of only 30,000, and we have 200 volunteers and we didn't have to beat any bushes. That says a lot for the community of Manhattan and the faculty and students of K-State," he said.

One group of volunteers was composed of members of the Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity, which raised approximately $1,200 dollars for the event from their annual chariot relay which was held April 13 in Memorial Stadium.

"We wanted to devote more money to Special Olympics and to the community this year. We feel this will affect more people and will be of better use to a worthy cause," Bill Charlton, sophomore in political science and a member Lambda Chi Alpha, said.

This money was added to other donations to make a total exceeding $3,000 dollars, which was used to purchase equipment and uniforms for the participants in the local games. Some of it also went toward the three-day state meet held in Wichita and the two-day Special Olympics held at Lawrence. The money pays for gas, food and lodging for approximately 20 participants and five chaperones, Engstrom said.

Shane Stevenson, chairman of the opening ceremonies at the local competition, said work began months before the event actually took place.

"We (volunteers) started at the first of this semester making signs for each school with participants, inviting a guest speaker and giving out awards to the donors," Stevenson said.

According to Johnson, volunteers were needed for such things as organizing a parade, running the clocks and setting up equipment.

Volunteers also were needed to act as coaches for the participants, Johnson said.

Athlete defeats disability

Although he stands only 5 feet 4 inches tall and his frame is slim, his rugged face makes him look bold and mighty. His smile radiates happiness and pleasure to all the people he meets.

His name is Mark Grove and he is one of the hundreds of specially gifted, physically limited athletes who attended the Area III Special Olympics in Manhattan on Saturday. Grove is 39 years old and has had cerebral palsy since birth. This year was the sixth year Grove participated in the competition.

His three main events are the 25-meter swim, the softball throw and the 25-meter wheelchair race.

"Mark has a physical defect, but he can think and communicate very well," Jerry Henry, Special Olympics coach from Atchison, said.

When Grove began competing in the 25-meter swim his time was about two minutes. Saturday, however, he decreased his time to 50 seconds.

Grove's competitors have an advantage over him because he must pull himself along the pool rope to finish the race.

"I was very impressed at the swimming meet with how hard they were trying. It was very inspiring to see them performing. It was really hitting home," Bob Patron, volunteer swimming official, said.

Grove also does well in the softball throw, usually throwing it about 16 meters, and the wheelchair race. Like swimming, he has managed to decrease his time in the wheelchair race.

When he began competing in the wheelchair race, it took him approximately one minute to finish. Saturday Grove completed the race in 32 seconds, Henry said.

This year Grove also was the assistant coach for the Atchison soccer team. This is the first year the Area III Special Olympics has included a soccer game, Bob McRae, coordinator for the event, said.

When Grove isn't attending the meets, he can often be found at the YMCA or local college.

"The YMCA and college are good rehabilitation places to keep Mark in shape and prepared for the Special Olympics each year," Henry said.

Grove also works in a bar in Atchison stamping customers' hands after their identification has been checked.

"Mark has a very fun-loving personality. He is very positive and a very enjoyable person to be around. He is seldom down and a very responsible person," McRae said.

Between working at the bar and working out for the olympics, Mark spends time at a workshop in his hometown.

"He enjoys the atmosphere of his friends at work at the sheltered workshop, and he learns to become very dependent on himself," Henry said.

Dixie Brandon, Manhattan, competes in the softball throw.

Scott Groth, freshman in computer science, hugs a contestant following her completion of the 50-yard dash.

Settlement may slow new practice of imposing mid-year tuition hikes

By The College Press Service

In a settlement that could help slow colleges' new practice of imposing mid-year tuition hikes and surcharges, the University of South Carolina has agreed to repay the extra tuition it charged 16 of its medical students in 1981.

Each of the students will get back their $215 surcharges.

The students claimed the surcharge amounted to a retroactive tuition increase that breached their enrollment contracts.

A state court agreed with the students last October, but South Carolina appealed the decision.

In late March, lawyers for all parties agreed to drop the appeal. Under the settlement, South Carolina repaid the students and promised not to make any more retroactive increases, Paul Ward, the university's chief lawyer, said.

He said the state legislature belatedly limited the medical school's 1981 budget after the catalog, which listed tuition for the term as $790, had been printed.

To get enough money to operate, the medical school had to charge each student an extra $215.

"It was a very unusual set of circumstances," Ward said, "and I'm not sure they would occur in any other state."

Others disagreed.

Colleges' legal right to impose mid-year hikes and surcharges "depends really on how the enrollment contract is worded," Estelle Fishbein, lawyer at Johns Hopkins University and past president of the National Association of College and University Attorneys, said.

"I imagine that (settlement) will cause a few people to think before raising tuition in mid-year," Darel Semler of the National Organization of Legal Problems in Education (NOLPE) in Topeka, Kan., said.

"Students and institutions exist in a contractual relationship," Don Gehring, a NOLPE officer who also is a professor of higher education at the University of Louisville, said. "Terms are set up in the catalog. The courts say both sides have to play by the rules. Once (students) register and pay tuition, the college can't alter the contract."

Bob Ross, attorney for the University of Missouri system, said most of the catalogs state that tuition is "subject to change," and would therefore allow schools to impose surcharges.

Missouri, caught in a budget squeeze, recently imposed a tuition surcharge on its students, but then rescinded it after Gov. Kit Bond released additional funds for state colleges.

"I think you'd have to say more than that (tuition is 'subject to change')," Fishbein said.

But none of the lawyers contacted for this article was ready to say the South Carolina settlement will profoundly affect the abilities of campuses to impose unplanned tuition increases on their students.

"I just don't know of another institution (besides the University of South Carolina) that's applied a surcharge," Gehring said.

There have been many, although the pace has slowed this academic year.

Starting in 1981-1982, colleges — caught in budget crunches caused by the "tax revolts" of earlier years, federal funding cuts and the recession — began imposing mid-year surcharges and hikes in increasing numbers.

Since then, the University of Arizona, the University of Alabama, the California State University system, Oregon State University, the University of Wisconsin, the University of New Hampshire, the University of Lowell (Lowell, Massachusetts) and Mankato State University, among others, have forced their students to pay more than the amounts listed in their catalogs.

California last year barred public colleges from raising tuition and fees in mid-year.

And Gannon College in Pennsylvania has just adopted a guaranteed tuition plan that promises freshmen their charges will stay the same for four years.

But "the court did not rule surcharges are illegal," Ward said. "It doesn't affect the ability of schools to alter tuition and fees. They just can't alter them retroactively."

National survey reveals increase in students' use of financial aid

By The College Press Service

More than half of all full-time college students received some form of financial aid last year, according to one of the most sweeping studies to date on the impact of aid programs.

Nationally, 51 percent of the students surveyed at more than 2,800 colleges and universities received either federal, state or private financial assistance to help with their college costs, a new survey by the American Council on Education (ACE) shows.

"I think a lot of people are surprised that over half of all students received some form of aid," said Charles Anderson, one of the ACE researchers who compiled the report.

Nearly 42 percent of the full-time undergraduates at four-year public colleges received aid, while 65 percent of the students at private colleges got assistance.

Part of the reason for the greater use of aid among private school students was due to the increased amount of private, campus-based aid available, Anderson said.

But the increased cost of attending private institutions — nearly double the expense of attending a public school — was also responsible for students at those schools being awarded larger aid amounts, he said.

Among less-costly institutions — where annual student expenses are less than $3,000 — 46 percent of the students drew some form of financial aid, compared with nearly 60 percent at more expensive schools.

Of the $7.7 billion in student aid distribution last year, 54 percent went to students at public campuses, the study stated.

Federal programs accounted for more than half of all the aid money disbursed.

Seventy-eight percent of all the dependent students who received aid came from families with incomes below $30,000.

Confirming some financial aid experts' worst fears, the study found that many of the colleges which experienced enrollment declines in 1982-1983 attributed the dropoff to reported cutbacks and confusion over the amount of financial aid available.

"In 1982-1983 there were attempts and a lot of talk about drastic cuts in the federal financial aid program," Anderson said.

Although many of the cuts did not occur, there was uncertainty among students over whether there was enough aid, he said.

Consequently, of the one-fourth of the schools which reported enrollment declines last year, nearly one-third reported that reduced student aid was a factor. Another one-third blame student uncertainty over financial aid as a primary reason many students didn't enroll.

"But the biggest surprise was that the breakdown of what kinds of aid students receive remained fairly consistent across classes (from freshmen to seniors)," he said.

The average student pays about one-third of his annual college expenses. A third comes from fellowships and grants, and the remaining third comes from loans and part-time work.

Legislature compromises on state pay plan

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Legislature accepted Sunday a compromise proposal on a state pay plan, sending the measure to Gov. John Carlin and breaking a House-Senate stalemate which had delayed adjournment of the 1984 session.

Dissolving the deadlock over the bill providing pay raises for state employees set the Legislature on a steady march to adjournment expected by late evening Sunday, although leaders conceded a delicate coalition of Republicans and Democrats was needed to win approval of the omnibus appropriations bill in the House.

By the time they finally quit, the lawmakers were expected to have funded a Fiscal Year 1985 budget of $3.33 billion, of which $1.67 billion would come from state tax revenue sources. Based on projected revenues, the state treasury was expected to have a balance of $83.3 million at the end of next fiscal year.

An agreement on the final funding measure of the session included removal of a 2 percent across-the-board reduction in state agency spending next fiscal year which the House had put in the bill in an effort to bolster a marginally adequate state general fund balance.

Conservative House Republicans vowed to fight for restoration of the cuts, despite opposition to the 11th-hour budget trimming from GOP Speaker Mike Hayden and the promise of a veto by Democratic Gov. John Carlin.

As a tradeoff for giving up the 2 percent cut, House conference committee members had agreed to reduce a bonus payment to state employees contained in the pay bill by $3.3 million from the $9.9 million proposed by the Senate, and not let it to go into their salary bases.

Agreement over how to distribute the $6.6 million in bonus payments to state employees had delayed adjournment Saturday night and forced a rare Sunday session for the second year in a row. Before 1983, the last previous Sunday session by the Kansas Legislature was on Easter Sunday in 1947.

The break in the standoff which stymied adjournment came when the Senate adopted, 21-18, a conference committee's agreement on the pay plan following an hour of debate after the Legislature reconvened Sunday for the fifth day of its wrapup session and the 92nd day of the entire '84 session.

That vote sent the pay bill to the House, where it passed, 63-57, behind strong support from the majority Republican Party.

Democrats in both houses tried to block adoption of the pay bill conference committee compromise. They lost 18-19 in the Senate and 57-63 in the House after hour-long debates on motions to reject the agreement and send the conference committee back to the bargaining table.

Opponents of the pay plan said it shortchanged state employees because faculty members at the state universities and teachers in the public school system are going to receive higher base salary raises next fiscal year. They accused Republicans of shorting state workers to insure an income tax increase placed on those in the higher income tax brackets will be allowed to expire as scheduled at the end of this year.

At the heart of the dispute was whether to put a $204 extra payment contemplated to be paid to all state workers during the fiscal year which begins July 1 into their wage bases or just make it a one-time boost in their take-home pay.

The difference determined whether $4.3 million of the cost became a permanent part of the state general fund budget for future years. The other $2.3 million of the cost came from other funds.

The $204 would be in addition to a 5 percent cost-of-living raise all state employees would receive when the new fiscal year starts, which both houses had agreed to keep in the pay plan.

Some senators and Carlin argued the "bonus" increase — which would be paid in two installments of $102 on Nov. 1 this year and $102 on March 1 next year — should go into the workers' base wages to help them keep pace with larger pay raises being provided professors and teachers.

However, House leaders insisted the state couldn't afford to make the $4.3 million expenditure permanent and maintain a minimally adequate balance of $83.3 million in the state general fund on June 30, 1985.

The Legislature gave up trying to adjourn shortly after 11 p.m. Saturday when the conference committee on the omnibus appropriations bill failed to agree on a compromise after getting very close to one.

Authorities search for illegal aliens after train slams into group, kills 4

By The Associated Press

KINGSVILLE, Texas — A freight train plowed through a group of illegal aliens walking across a railroad trestle in the dark, forcing some to jump into a shallow creek 31 feet below and killing four of them. At least seven were injured.

As many as 50 aliens may have been on the bridge when the train approached late Saturday night at about 40 mph, said Kleberg County sheriff's dispatcher Jody Guerra.

"We haven't found all of them yet," Guerra said.

A Border Patrol spokesman said the dead were a woman and three children.

Tim Hogan, a Missouri Pacific spokesman in Chicago, said the engineer of the 43-car freight saw the people on the bridge but was unable to stop the train until it had crossed the 464-foot trestle over Olmos Creek 17 miles south of Kingsville.

Authorities arrested 14 aliens who escaped injury, and searched Sunday for more victims in the 3- to 4-foot-deep creek and for other aliens who may have sought cover in the mesquite that dots the rugged coastal plains south of Corpus Christi.

"We've been searching all night," said Rod Saucier, agent in charge of the Border Patrol office here.

He said the aliens were walking north across the trestle when they were surprised about 10:10 p.m. Saturday by the Missouri Pacific freight train traveling south from Kingsville to Harlingen.

As the train approached, some of the aliens jumped from the bridge, some tried to outrun the train and some tried to avoid the locomotive by standing at the edge of the trestle, Saucier said.

Saucier said some of the 14 uninjured aliens who were arrested immediately after the accident were taken to the Kennedy County sheriff's office at Sarita. He said authorities think most of the aliens were from El Salvador, with some from Mexico.

Five of the injured were taken to Memorial Hospital in nearby Corpus Christi and two were taken to Kleberg Hospital in Kingsville.

A spokesman for Kleberg said two patients were in intensive care and an uninjured child was admitted to the pediatric unit for shelter only.

Men's baseball team splits double-header

By TODD NIGHSWONGER
Collegian Reporter

Most pitchers with a 1-7 record would gladly take credit for any win, but K-State Pitcher Mike Wilkerson is not like that.

Instead of talking about his accomplishments after holding the the University of Missouri Tigers to three hits in the Wildcats' 3-1 Big Eight Conference baseball victory in the second game of Saturday's double-header, Wilkerson was praising his teammates.

"Steve Goodwin did an excellent job of calling pitches today," he said. "Our defense played a super game, and they played hard-nosed baseball."

MU won the first game of the double-header, 4-1, at Frank Myers Field as three K-State errors gave the Tigers two unearned runs.

A twin-bill between the Tigers and Wildcats Sunday was rained out and is rescheduled for 12:30 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field.

The battery team of Wilkerson and Goodwin was successful in keeping the MU hitters off balance in the second game.

"We kept changing patterns on them, and we were just trying to stay in front of the hitters to make them hit a pitch that maybe they don't necessarily want to hit," Wilkerson said. "We were determined to come out of here with at least one win."

MU Head Coach Gene McArthur said he was impressed with Wilkerson.

"He pitched well, had pretty good command of his pitches and we didn't hit very many balls hard," he said.

The Wildcats were aided by three Tiger errors, including back-to-back errors in the third inning that allowed K-State to score two runs without a hit.

The inning opened with the Tigers' starting pitcher, Dave Otto, walking Steve Goodwin. Errors by Tiger's first baseman Brad Bollinger and second baseman Nick Rallo allowed Mark Goodwin and Todd Thamer to reach base. With the bases loaded, slugger Cary Colbert sent home Steve Goodwin with a sacrifice fly to deep right center.

Possibly the biggest blunder of the game followed as third baseman Chris Benak took a grounder off the bat of Kerry Golden and hesitated in choosing whether to go for the tag at third or throwing to first. Benak ended up holding the ball as Mark Goodwin scored. During the confusion, Thamer thought Benak had thrown to first and was caught in a run down between third and home to end the inning.

MU's lone run came in the top of the third as Wilkerson worked his way out of a bases-loaded jam.

Wilkerson then settled down and retired the last 11 batters with the help of one double play and two strike outs.

K-State's other run came in the fifth as Mark Goodwin singled and eventually scored when Otto Kaifes hit into a double play.

The Wildcats, with only four hits, were led by Thamer with two hits and Mark Goodwin with two runs scored.

In the first game, MU immediately jumped on Wildcat starter Lynn Lichter with two runs on four hits and a sacrifice fly with Lichter allowing Benak to hit into an inning-ending double play.

The Tigers added single runs in the fifth and seventh innings. Both runs scored as a result of Wildcat errors.

MU hurler Dave Biscan gave up seven hits but was able to escape with one run as K-State failed to get the key hits.

Saturday's split left MU with a 23-14 record, 4-5 in the Big Eight Conference. K-State is now 12-22, 2-16 in Big Eight action.

K-State's Todd Thamer stands up after sliding safely into second base as Missouri's shortstop bobbles the ball. K-State split Saturday's double-header by losing 1-4 and winning 3-1 against Missouri.

Tracksters set records at OU, Iowa

For the first time during the outdoor track season, the K-State men's and women's track squads received the opportunity to compete in favorable weather conditions; not in the wind and the rain that has thus far slowed the squads.

As in previous meets, the squads were again split up, participating in two different meets the past weekend. At the Drake Relays in Des Moines, Iowa, most of the men and five members from the women's squad — Deb Pihl, Anne Stadler, Pinkie Suggs, Rita Graves and Betsy Silzer — competed and produced several personal-best performances.

The remainder of the women's squad, plus a few members of the men's squad (including Ray Hansen and Brian Howie), traveled to Norman, Okla., for the Nike Invitational and returned with seven first-place finishes.

The big winner for the Wildcats in Iowa was triple jumper Kenny Harrison. Harrison leaped a national-qualifying distance of 52-8½ to earn first place in the event.

Alfredo Rosas and Silzer were the Wildcats that ran personal bests in their respective long-distance running events, while Graves added a season's best performance in her high jump competition.

In the 10,000-meter run, Rosas turned in a school record with a time of 29 minutes and 16.67 seconds — just eight seconds shy of the national-qualifying mark. Rosas' time wiped out the record that he set earlier this season when he ran 29:52 at the Texas Relays.

Silzer finished ninth in the 5,000-meter run with a time of 16:26.73, good enough for a personal-best time and a school record. This national-qualifying time surpassed the mark Silzer set last year with a time of 16:31.

Graves placed second in the high jump with her personal-best performance of 5-feet-11½.

In Oklahoma, Hansen was the top performer with his record-setting finish in the javelin. He tossed the javelin 283 feet — 16 feet beyond his personal-best throw — to set a K-State record.

Other Wildcats who finished first at the Nike Invitational included Howie, Ray Mosier, Barb Ludovise, Michelle Maxey, Donna King and the 400-meter relay team composed of Kelly Wenlock, Maxey, Dana Brown and King.

Nationally ranked Blue Jays stop 'Cats, 3-0, 6-0

Holding the K-State's women's softball team to only four hits in two games, the nationally ranked Creighton University Blue Jays slapped a 3-0 and 6-0 double-header defeat on the Wildcats in Saturday's action at Omaha.

The Blue Jays, ranked among the nation's top 15 teams, also hold the No. 2 spot in K-State's region behind Oklahoma State University. OSU is currently ranked No. 5 in the nation.

Creighton grabbed two runs in the second and scored one unearned run in the sixth to take the first-game victory. The Blue Jays accumulated eight hits against K-State pitcher Kathy Gillpatrick, who now has a 4-10 record.

The Wildcats, who connected for only three hits in the contest, committed three errors and left six runners on base. Creighton committed only one error in the game.

"At the end of the first game we ended up with the bases loaded, and they were all freshman and a freshman was at bat," Head Coach Ralph Currie said of a young K-State squad that has only four upperclassmen — two juniors and two seniors. "That was really encouraging to me because we've got a young team. We started five freshmen in the second game, and that's just an awful lot of youngsters playing ball."

Currie said the Wildcats' youth and lack of outdoor playing time due to weather conditions have affected their playing experience.

"We've been rained out so many games," he said. "Our young girls needed those games really bad. They're young, and it helps them if they can stay on the diamond."

K-State again had its hitting difficulties in the second contest, connecting on only one hit and leaving only one player on base.

White team defensive lineman Grady Newton charges in for the tackle during Saturday night's Purple-White intra-squad football scrimmage in KSU Stadium. The white team defeated the purple team 31-17.

White runs past Purple, 31-17

The K-State football team concluded spring drills as the White team defeated the Purple squad, 31-17, in the Purple-White intra-squad game Saturday night at KSU Stadium.

Quarterback Stan Weber paced the White team to a 28-0 lead before being replaced by redshirt freshman Randy Williams.

A 47-yard touchdown gallop by Lemuel James and Greg Dageforde's 4-yard touchdown jaunt gave the Whites a quick 14-0 lead in the first quarter.

In the second quarter, Weber scored from the 8-yard line and freshman runningback Ray Wilson added a 9-yard touchdown run to put the Whites ahead 28-0.

The Purple squad put its first points on the board just before halftime. Donnie Campbell tossed a 49-yard pass to Todd Elder, which set up a one-yard run by Maurice Pearl.

Kicker Steve Willis, who kicked for both sides, booted a 32-yard field goal for the Purple team in the third quarter to make the score 28-10.

Redshirt freshman Tony Jordan then sprinted 50 yards on a reverse for a touchdown that cut the White team's lead to 28-17.

The only other points of the game came on a 43-yard field goal by Willis for the White team.

Jordan was the game's leading rusher with 97 yards on 12 carries, while James had 73 yards on eight totes.

Weber led the passers, completing 10 of 13 attempts for 133 yards, while Campbell completed six of 15 for 92 yards, including two interceptions. Williams was four for eight for 40 yards.

Willis kicked six extra points in addition to his field goals. He missed on a 50-yard and a 64-yard attempt.

The game was played without kickoffs and punt returns, and the last three quarters were shortened to 12 minutes. Another rule change was that a team behind by 14 points or more after it scored regained possession of the ball.

The Wildcats will open their 1984 season at Vanderbilt University on Sept. 8. Their first home contest will be on the following weekend against Tennessee Tech. University.

K-State's first Big Eight Conference game is at the University of Oklahoma on Sept. 29.

Royals' batting slump continues; rainout dampens Toronto's spirits

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Toronto Blue Jays, who are off to their best start ever, hung their heads when Sunday's game with Kansas City was postponed by rain.

"This is the last thing you want to happen when you're going good," said pitcher Dave Stieb, who's never gone better. His three-hit shutout of the Royals Saturday night hiked his mark to 4-0 and lowered his earned run average to 1.88. And the Blue Jays headed back to Toronto Sunday for a seven-day homestand with a 13-9 record, solidly in second place in the American League East behind the sizzling-hot Detroit Tigers.

"When you're rolling like we've been, you hate to see rainouts more than ever," Stieb said. "You're always afraid the team might lose some momentum, or some rhythm. But it will be good to get back home."

The Royals did not exactly come right out and admit it, but there have been worse times for them to postpone games. In losing five of their last six games and sinking to an 8-11 record, their bats have turned to rubber. In those six games, they have scored only eight runs, hit

.190 as a team and an even more miserable .088 with runners in scoring position. When Stieb blanked them out Saturday night following a combined shutout the night before by Doyle Alexander and Dennis Lamp, it was the first time since 1974 a Kansas City team has failed to score in consecutive games.

"You never know," said designated hitter Hal McRae, who tripled for one of the three hits off Stieb Saturday night. "We might have gone out and scored 15 runs today (Sunday) and broken out of our slump. But it could be a good thing for us, too."

The rainout was the sixth of the year for the Royals and the fourth which is yet to be made up. It was rescheduled as part of a two-night doubleheader July 23.

"Maybe by then, we'll be swinging the bats again," McRae said.

Also by then, the Royals should have centerfielder Willie Wilson and third baseman George Brett, who between them last year scored more than 25 percent of the team's runs.

Wilson is under suspension until May 15 because of his involvement in the much-publicized drug case last fall. Brett, a two-time American League batting champion, suffered ligament damage to a knee in the final spring training game and may be back by June 1.

"I'm not one to make excuses, and everybody has injuries, but let's face it — we're not the same offensive team without those two guys in there," said Kansas City Manager Dick Howser. "I do think we're a better offensive club than we've shown. There probably have been three factors. First of all, we've faced some awfully good pitchers lately, Phil Niekro (of the New York Yankees) and Stieb, for instance, who are both hot."

"I think the inconsistency in the weather has hurt us, too. And, we don't have two of our best hitters."

A team can break a prolonged offensive drought in one inning, Howser said.

"All you need when you're having trouble scoring is to get four or five runs in one inning sometimes, and then everybody seems to break out," he said. "I'm not pleased with our record. But I'm not discouraged. When we get our leadoff hitter (Wilson) and our No. 3 hitter (Brett) back in the lineup, we're going to score more runs."

NFL draft to be anti-climatic

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — When the National Football League draft starts Tuesday, just as most fans are sitting down to breakfast, No. 3 will be No. 1.

The New England Patriots and Houston Oilers already have used the first two picks to claim the two most coveted college players — Nebraska wide receiver Irving Fryar and Cornhusker teammate Dean Steinkuhler. The third pick, which belongs to the New York Giants, will be the first point of suspense.

The 28 NFL teams will convene at 7 a.m. at the Omni Park Hotel to divvy up a class of 1984 that wasn't considered much to begin with and has been further diluted by the United States Football League. It will be a one-day draft with 12 rounds, televised live by ESPN cable.

If previous drafts have commanded as much attention as any NFL event outside the Super Bowl, this year's session will be anti-climatic.

Somewhere from a third to a quarter of the top-rated picks — those with what the scouts call

"make-it" potential — already have been signed by the USFL. Included among them are quarterback Steve Young, running back Mike Rozier and defensive tackle Reggie White.

"We've got the cards — the ones that are left," says Giants Coach Bill Parcells. But the best cards — Wilber Marshall of Florida and Carl Banks of Michigan State — are outside linebackers, precisely the position New York is already the strongest.

So the Giants, who are weak in the offensive line and who had coveted Steinkuhler, likely will trade down for a choice somewhere in the top 10 with additional compensation. They may take either Brian Blades of North Carolina or Bill Roberts of Ohio State, both huge offensive tackles. That would make Banks or Marshall available to a team ready to pay the price.

After the Giants, the Philadelphia Eagles and the Kansas City Chiefs choose.

The Eagles, who need offense, are considering Penn State wide receiver Kenny Jackson.

Expos shoot down Cardinals

By The Associated Press

A 6-2 victory over the St. Louis Cardinals snapped the Montreal Expos' three-game losing streak Sunday, but they were forced to endure some pain along the way.

Shortstop Argenis Salazar will miss at least two days because he bruised his wrist after being hit by a pitch; second baseman Bryan Little turned an ankle completing a double play, and relief pitcher Gary Lucas was left with the imprint of a baseball on his left hand after stopping a line drive.

But, in the view of starter Charlie Lea, who tossed a five-hitter over seven innings, it was a big one to win.

"We swept the Cardinals in St. Louis last weekend, and we didn't want them to do the same thing to us this weekend," said Lea, who left with the bases loaded and none out in the eighth.

"For seven innings, I thought that was the best I've pitched this year," added Lea. "I just lost my concentration after that; I don't know why."

Lucas relieved and walked in a run, but a run-scoring double-play ball and a leaping catch of George Hendrick's line drive by left fielder Derrell Thomas got him out of further trouble.

"I would like to have had better stuff," said Lucas, who struggled through the ninth before getting another double play. "It was really a battle for me because I was all over the place with my pitches."

The Expos staked Lea to a 2-0 lead in the second. Rookie Argenis Salazar, hitting .152 entering the game, drove in Tim Wallach with the first run by lining an RBI triple into left center field. Wallach had opened the inning against starter Danny Cox, 2-2, with a single.

With two out, Rose singled sharply into left field to score Salazar.

In the fourth, Salazar was hit on the right wrist by a Cox pitch. He left the game for precautionary X-rays.

Rose made it 3-0 in the fifth after a leadoff single. He moved to second on Bryan Little's sacrifice bunt, took third on an infield out and scored on Gary Carter's single to left.

In other action, the Chicago White Sox also snapped a five-game losing streak with a 6-4 victory over the Boston Red Sox. Ron Kittle drove in five runs and hit two home runs in the win.

Kittle capped a three-run first with a two-run homer and slammed his second in the third after Greg Walker and Greg Luzinski had singled.

Olympic preparations concern LA students

By The College Press Service

LOS ANGELES — Despite worries about crunched summer school schedules, being thrown out of their dorms or apartments and the noise and inconvenience of a great deal of on-campus construction projects, college students in Los Angeles apparently are greeting one of the largest intrusions on college life ever concocted — the Summer Olympic Games — stoically.

"UCLA," concedes 20-year-old Colleen Kenby, a University of California at Los Angeles junior, in a typical assessment, "has done the best they could."

Students have long been worried they'd be victimized by the huge infusion of visitors to the Olympics. The main reason is that many of the games and much of the housing will be in the Civic Center area of town, near the University of Southern California, and in Westwood, home of UCLA.

Pepperdine University, which is in on the beach in Malibu, Loyola Marymount University, California State University at Los Angeles and California State University at Dominguez Hills also will play major roles in the games, hosting events and housing up to 10,000 athletes.

All the activities — which are expected to bring an estimated 200,000 people a day to southern California — take place July 28 through Aug. 12, at time when many of the students at the campuses involved ordinarily would be going to summer school or living in their apartments, holding their leases until the regular school year.

None of that is possible this summer.

The University of Southern California is converting some of its dorms into the main Olympic Village, housing up to some 700 athletes.

Summer school, which normally runs into early August, will start earlier (May 9th) and end earlier (July 25th) than usual, Duane Hickling, USC's executive Olympic administrator, said.

UCLA also is starting its summer sessions a week earlier than usual and cutting them short in July.

Pepperdine is changing the format of its summer sessions to accommodate the games, Dean John S. Wilson, said.

Most student worries, however, have concerned where they'd live during those summer sessions.

With athletes moving into the dorms and off-campus rents jacked up beyond student budgets in order to profit from the visitors, students would have no place to go.

"Everyone's been cautious to plan carefully," Felicia Sison, student Olympics coordinator at UCLA, said. "Students have anticipated the housing shortage."

USC's Hickling said any students who need dorm rooms, but can't get them during the games, will be moved "just across the street" to off-campus housing.

In anticipation of the problem, the Los Angeles City Council passed a law making it difficult to evict residents from any housing during the Olympics period.

But Damon Martin, UCLA's assistant housing director, warns students that they have to be aware of the law to be protected by it and to avoid being evicted by off-campus landlords trying to impose "monopoly-level" rents.

"Generally, the only way a landlord can evict you is if you break the lease," he said.

Some landlords consequently are watching students closely for anything resembling lease-breaking behavior.

"You have this feeling you've got to be on your best behavior," said Nancy Cutler, a 22-year-old UCLA senior.

In the Westwood area around UCLA, one-bedroom apartments currently rent for about $700 a month. According to some press reports, the asking price for the summer is up to $800-$900 a week.

At the 1982 World's Fair, held next to the University of Tennessee, Knoxville city ordinances against rent gouging during the fair did prevent landlords from evicting about 20 students, UT officials report.

Yet, aside from a USC graduate student, southern California schools have received few complaints from students claiming they were being evicted in order to vacate apartments for higher-paying Olympics visitors.

Some students, of course, are not even bothering to try to go to school during the Olympics.

"A lot of people plan to get out of the area," Gigi Fairchild, USC's student liaison to the Olympic Committee, said.

New rules require list of funeral costs

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — After nearly a dozen years of investigation and debate, federal regulations take effect today requiring morticians to give customers detailed explanations of what they will have to pay for funeral services.

Stormy battles in Congress and the courts have surrounded the Federal Trade Commission rules, which stem from an investigation into funeral business practices launched in 1972.

A portion of the rules finally took effect last January, and the last hurdle fell only in March, when the National Funeral Directors Association decided not to carry its battle to the Supreme Court.

"Our members are ready to comply with the regulations...and continue to supply valuable assistance and support to the American consumer," said association President Morris Nilsen.

A funeral is "unquestionably one of the most difficult purchases that a consumer will make, and this rule is a beginning in terms of making that purchase easier," said Jack Gillis, public relations director for the Consumer Federation of America.

The portion of the rule taking effect requires funeral directors to provide their customers with an item-by-item list of funeral costs.

Nilsen, of Richfield, Minn., said in a telephone interview that his group has provided a 50-page booklet of explanation and sample forms to its 14,000 members across the country.

In addition, a videotape explanation was shown to 5,500 of the funeral directors at a special teleconference, he said, and has also been provided for showing at state funeral directors' conventions.

A second provision taking effect may be more of a problem, requiring funeral services to give out prices on the telephone.

The rules that took effect in January prohibit funeral directors from telling customers that embalming is required or that a casket is necessary, if that is not so under local or state laws.

After a decade of investigations into funeral industry practices, the commission passed the rule in July 1982, over the objections of FTC Chairman James C. Miller III.

Both funeral directors and some members of Congress have contended that the rule was unnecessary because no national pattern of abuses had been proven.

The funeral directors group filed suit, but the regulation was upheld by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va.

After that ruling, the association decided not to appeal to the Supreme Court, because it decided it "should get on with doing our professional work," Nilsen said.

A resolution to veto the rule was introduced in the House of Representatives by Rep. Marty Russo, D-Ill., but it failed to get out of committee.

Air Force program aids college seniors

By TONA TURNER
Collegian Reporter

A new financial assistance program is being offered to senior engineering students by the U.S. Air Force.

The program, College Senior Engineering Program (CSEP), is unrelated to Air Force ROTC.

CSEP is designed to pay selected engineering seniors $1,000 per month for 12 months while they finish school and earn their degrees.

Kerry Habiger and Luray Lister, both seniors in electrical engineering, currently are the only two K-State students in CSEP.

The graduate must then enlist in the Air Force for at least four years, where he will be paid for his services, Sgt. Johnnie Hood, Manhattan's Air Force recruiter, said.

After completing the enlistment term, the Air Force will help place the individual in the job market, generally with a higher salary than engineers who have four years of engineering experience, but no connection with the Air Force, Hood said.

Hood said applications are generally filled out 15 months prior to enlistment. Qualified applicants then go before a selection board for interviews.

CSEP is new in Kansas.

"We've only been established here for about six months," Hood said. In the six-month period, CSEP has received six applications from senior engineering students from Kansas and none have been turned down, Hood said.

He said he did not know how many students are in CSEP nationwide, but said it was "a very large number."

While in school, the selected student is required to complete a minimum of 12 hours during both fall and spring semesters and six hours during the summer term, Hood said.

"We keep in touch with them just so they know what's going on," Hood said. Meetings and other duties are not required.

After graduation, the individual generally has from one week to 45 days before he must enlist in the Air Force.

"We have had extended cases before," Hood said. "One guy waited 90 days before he enlisted."

After enlisting, the graduates are sent to an officers' training school for 12 weeks. After training completion, the engineers branch off to different research and development laboratories.

During the first year of service, the CSEP engineer could expect a salary of $18,570; $22,990 during the second year; $26,464 in the third year and $30,255 in the fourth year. All Air Force benefit plans also are included in CSEP.

The CSEP engineer also has the opportunity to get his master's and doctorate degrees free through the Air Force Institute of Technology or have 75 percent of his off-duty courses from another college paid, Hood said.

The Air Force needs electrical, nuclear, aeronautic and astronautical engineers, Hood said. CSEP is offered only to seniors in these fields.

"We have a set government budget, so we want to make that money go toward what we need," Hood said.

Alaska retains lead in per capita income

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Oil-rich Alaska led the nation in per capita income again last year, while Mississippi remained in last place, according to figures released Sunday by the Commerce Department.

Alaska retained its No. 1 ranking with a per capita income of $16,820, compared with $11,675 for the nation as a whole and $8,072 for Mississippi. The District of Columbia, where it a state, would have placed second at $16,409, up 8.9 percent from 1982.

As in 1982, Connecticut claimed the No. 2 spot second among the states, with a $14,826 per-resident average.

The national average was 5.2 percent above the 1982 level of $11,100, a year when Americans' personal income rose by 5.3 percent.

Even though the percentage gain was slightly lower last year, Americans actually were better off because inflation was lower. In 1983, prices rose 3.9 percent, compared with 5.9 percent in 1982 as measured by a Commerce Department gauge of personal consumption.

Incomes in Alaska were 44 percent above the national average, while the Mississippi figure was 31 percent below the national average.

The high-income states are mostly in the urbanized Northeast and the Far West, while the low-income states were largely in the Southeast and Rocky Mountain region, the report said.

But Alaska residents didn't enjoy the fastest growth in 1983. That honor among the states went to New Hampshire, where per capita incomes rose by 8.4 percent. Other big gainers were Massachusetts, Georgia, Connecticut, Arkansas, Virginia, Rhode Island, Alabama, New Jersey and Oregon.

Two states actually declined in 1983. Wyoming had a 2 percent drop-off, while average incomes in Oklahoma were down 0.5 percent. The states with the smallest percentage gains were South Dakota, Alaska, Louisiana, West Virginia, Utah, Texas, Iowa and Nebraska.

In general, the states with large increases enjoyed large payroll growth in manufacturing, construction and private-service industries, the report said. The states with declines or only small increases for the most part had little or no increase in payrolls in the same industries.

Deer die as result of nature imbalance

By The Associated Press

IPSWICH, Mass. — On the sweeping lawn of an old estate, two deer graze like cows on yellowed grass. By the beach, the brush at the edge of the dunes has been nibbled bare. In the woods, a thin doe stands up lazily as intruders approach.

Wildlife biologists say it is a sylvan scene gone sour, a place where the balance of nature has been upset by an overabundance of whitetail deer.

But members of an animal protection group, Friends of Animals, say the problem has been blown out of proportion and that nature, left undisturbed, will set things right.

The debate concerns an estimated 165 deer at the 1,400-acre Crane Memorial Reservation, located on the seashore about 25 miles north of Boston. Last fall, reservation trustees and local officials proposed a special hunt to thin the herd by 75.

The hunt was canceled after protesters threatened to stand between the hunters and their quarry.

Since then, 17 deer — 16 of them fawns between 9 and 18 months old — have been found dead. Autopsies on four of the fawns showed the animals died of starvation, and evidence of malnutrition was present in the deer that were not dissected.

Charles Sedgwick, chief of the wildlife clinic at Tufts University's School of Veterinary Medicine in Grafton, said the autopsied fawns weighed less than two-thirds of normal, showed abnormal wear to their teeth, had enlarged stress glands and had used up all reserves of fat.

"They were in pretty severe straits," he said. "I've been a veterinarian for 27 years and I haven't seen anything like this bad for a long time."

Priscilla Feral of Norwalk, Conn., a leader of the Friends of Animals New England chapter, said death among fawns isn't unusual, and that state biologists are preying on the ignorance of the public to promote their goal of allowing hunting on the oceanside preserve.

"This starvation ruse is nothing more than a pandering to the heartstrings of the bleeding-heart public," she said. "Those fawns would have died regardless of whether hunters had slaughtered and wounded half the herd."

But James McDonough, a game biologist with the Massachusetts Department of Fisheries and Wildlife, disagreed.

"I don't know where they got that," he said. "We know there is a very high mortality rate among the immature fawns, but usually it occurs in the first two or three weeks of life. This is very unusual."

Whitetail deer, easily recognized when they flee by the flash of white fur on their backsides, have been on the increase in the United States since the turn of the century and now number at least 13 million, said William Hesselton, a senior staff specialist with U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service in Massachusetts.

The population explosion is in part the result of a very high reproductive rate combined with declining numbers of natural predators.

"If we had the rate of return in investment that deer have in reproduction we would all be millionaires," said Aaron Moen, a professor of wildlife ecology at Cornell University.

Regulated hunting seasons have kept their numbers in check in most states, but wildlife officials say overpopulation has been a recurrent problem in places like Crane where hunting is not permitted or there is little natural predation.

In several states and on federally controlled lands, sharpshooters and special public hunts have been used to cut down herds, Hesselton said.

In several western states including Oregon and Colorado, officials have taken up public collections to feed deer and other wildlife threatened with starvation during a particularly harsh winter.

Fearing that the deer population of Angel Island off Berkeley, Calif., would die of starvation, officials in 1981 transported 203 of the animals to the Myacamas Mountains. Nearly three years later, however, researchers found that only 85 percent of the herd had survived the new habitat.

In Florida, heavy rains and flooding two years ago forced state game officials to sanction a deer hunt in one section of the Everglades. The animals there were starving because high water had covered feeding areas. Undernourished deer were tiring, sometimes drowning, and were more vulnerable to infection.

Hunters killed more than 600 of the animals in July 1982. Opponents of the hunt rescued 18 deer, but most of them later died.

Moen has been hired by Trustees of Reservations, a group that owns the Crane Reservation, to determine how many deer the preserve can support and consider alternatives to controlling their numbers. The results of the study are due in October. Moen has been asked to consider alternatives including feeding, fencing off the property, birth control and capture and removal.

Breakdance craze finds way from big city to 'Little Apple'

Breakdancing has been seen at the movies and on television, and K-State students, faculty and staff got a taste of it firsthand Saturday at a breakdancing clinic held at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Complex.

Richard Ortiz, junior in architecture, provided demonstrations of this most recent form of dance to literally "hit" the streets.

"Breakdancing is dancing done close to the ground, or dancing on the ground," Ortiz said. Saturday's performances featured dance moves called the helicopter, the eggroll, the coffee grinder, the wave and popping.

Ortiz learned breakdancing in Denver where he and a friend, Mark Christensen, competed under the team name of the 16th Street Breakdancers. They won first overall in the Thrills-Breakoff Competition.

"It's (breakdancing) a freestyle type dancing," Ortiz said. "If someone is trying to learn from me, he or she doesn't have to do exactly like I do. If it feels good, do it," Ortiz said.

Ortiz continues to learn breakdancing techniques from watching videos. He also makes up moves of his own.

"It's a way of expressing myself," Ortiz said. Before breakdancing became popular, Ortiz was a freestyle skateboarder. When that fad died down, Ortiz looked for a new way to express himself.

He learned a dance called popping in Hawaii before learning to breakdance.

"Popping is also called the wave, because when you dance, you pretend that there is a wave going through your body," Ortiz said.

"To make the move you need to be young, real flexible and agile," he said. Youths ages 8 to 18, are good prospects, he said.

"You need to be flexible or you might risk pulling something," he said.

Breakdancing has been around since the early 1970s, Ortiz said. It became more well known at the beginning of this year through television commercials and the rest of the media. It has been popular in major cities such as California, Kansas City, Denver, Chicago and New York, where it originated, he said.

According to Ortiz, some youths in New York were having gang wars and decided rather than to fight it out they would dance it out, Ortiz said. They called a break to dance, and thus came the name breakdancing.

College presidents describe jobs

By The College Press Service

Despite what students, faculty and administrators think, college presidents don't have it made in their life at the top, at least according to a still-to-be-released study by the Association of Governing Boards of Universities and Colleges.

On the contrary, college presidents' jobs are filled with stress, long hours, few payoffs, and a feeling of isolation — factors which cause one out of four to teeter on the edge of resigning, said Marian Gade, one of the researchers working on the report, "Strengthening Presidential Leadership."

Gade and her fellow researchers have interviewed more than 800 college presidents, their spouses and other top university officials for the study.

While three of four of the presidents say they like their jobs, one out of four would like to resign at the first opportunity, the study has found.

Only 25 percent of the presidents say they thoroughly enjoy their jobs. Half say they like their jobs more than they dislike them. The rest are more or less disillusioned and burned out, ready to leave office for another position, the study shows.

The stress, loneliness of the job and long hours required of college presidents are the main reasons for the widespread dissatisfaction, Gade said.

"Few people really know what a complex job the presidency is, even at a small institution," she said.

"The causes of stress are those of financial pressures, working full-time, seven days a week, 24 hours a day, of dealing with collective bargaining, and more and more state and federal controls."

Presidents are also a lonely lot, she said, who don't identify with faculty, are politically separated from administrators, and typically not appreciated by their boards of trustees.

Turnover among college presidents in the last year seems to confirm the study's early findings.

Want To Sell Your Books ?

Question: How does the Union Bookstore determine how much your books are worth when you sell them back?

Answer: If the Bookstore has notification from the instructor that the books are to be re-adopted for use the next semester, and if the Bookstore does not already have a sufficient stock on hand, then you will be offered 60% of the publisher's current list price.

For example: If a book sells for $10 new and it meets the requirements noted above, the book would be bought from you for $6.

If the Bookstore has not received notice that the book will be used again, or if it already has a sufficient stock on hand, the book would be worth the current wholesale price as indicated by one of the nation's largest jobbers of used textbooks.

If you have any questions about the price being paid for a textbook, the buyer will be happy to answer any questions which you may have regarding the price paid.

Question: Is 60% the usual price paid for textbooks around the country?

Answer: Definitely not. Most stores in the United States pay only 50% for books being used again. The Union Bookstore is one of the few stores which pays 60%. And remember, we pay cash. You don't have to take your money out in trade.

Question: What about paperbacks? Does the 60% policy apply to them too?

Answer: Yes. The Union Bookstore does not penalize you on paperbacks. If they are being used again, and if the bookstore needs them, you will receive 60% of the publisher's list price.

Question: If the publisher's price has gone up since I bought my books, will I receive the benefit of that price increase?

Answer: Yes. For instance, if you bought your book for $9 and the publisher's list price is now $10, you will get $6, not $5.40.

Lady Bird honored at flower day

DENTON, Texas — Lady Bird Johnson is among four people who have been honored for their work with Texas wildflowers.

The widow of former President Lyndon B. Johnson was honored with the president's award Saturday at the 5th annual Texas Wildflower Day at Texas Women's University here.

Johnson, 70, who created the National Wildflower Research Center near Austin in 1962, was honored for her work with wildflowers and beautification.

She said she plans to spend the rest of her life learning about wildflowers.

"I'm going to do what I've always wanted to do, and that is learn about wildflowers. I'm going to do my bit to ensure that they will be a part of my seven grandchildren's lives and yours," she said.

Others honored were Dallas developer Trammell Crow, who received the Community Development-Corporate award; Geyata Ajilvsgi, of Hearne and College Station, who received the Publications-Photography award; and Frances Ellis of Paris, who won the Conservation Club Women award for her work with the East Texas Garden Clubs, nature trails and other conservation activities.

Baldrige ropes himself into fame

OKLAHOMA CITY — U.S. Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige, inducted over the weekend into the Cowboy Hall of Fame, says that when he worked on a ranch as a youth he wasn't sure he was cut out for life as a cowboy.

Baldrige, 61, and John Wesley Powell, who founded the Bureau of Ethnology of the Smithsonian Institution in 1880, were inducted into the Hall of Fame of Great Westerners on Saturday at the hall's museum of western history and art.

Now a wealthy industrialist and professional rodeo steer roper, he became acquainted with ranching at the age of 14 during the 1930s at a ranch in western Nebraska, working 12 hours a day, six or seven days a week, for a dollar a day.

"I wondered if I was really cut out for this kind of thing,"

Baldrige said.

He later worked other ranch jobs in Nebraska and Nevada, and one year he helped break broncos. "I spent a lot of time getting pitched off. I was never too good at that," he said.

He said concentrated on roping because "I always liked the fluidity and the grace and excitement of roping."

Baldrige later left the range and went into business, eventually becoming chairman of Scoville Inc. in Waterbury, Conn.

But he kept practicing his roping, and by the late 1960s he was a member of the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association. In 1970, he was ranked fifth in team steer roping by the association.

Dors collapses with stomach pains

WINDSOR, England — Actress Diana Dors, who has twice undergone surgery to remove cancerous tumors in the past two years, has been hospitalized again after collapsing with acute stomach pains.

But a hospital spokesman, who asked not to be identified, said the actress was being tested for a suspected bowel obstruction, believed to be unrelated to her cancer, and was "resting comfortably."

"We're praying that it is not cancer again," Dors' husband Alan Lake told the Sunday Express newspaper. "At the moment the signs are it is an unrelated intestinal problem."

John Paul II to meet with Reagan

Pope's tour includes South Korea

By The Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II has chosen South Korea as the focus of his second pilgrimage to the Pacific to pay a personal tribute to what Vatican officials call the world's fastest-growing Roman Catholic Church.

He begins the 11-day journey — his 21st foreign tour as pontiff — on Wednesday with a three-hour stopover in Fairbanks, Alaska, for a meeting with President Reagan, returning from a visit to China.

From there, the pope's special Alitalia jetliner will take the same route to Seoul flown by Korean Air Lines flight 007 in September before it strayed off course into Soviet airspace and was downed by Soviet missiles with the loss of 269 lives. Some Vatican officials said the gesture reflects the pope's wish to demonstrate solidarity with his Korean hosts.

Highlights of his trip include the raising to sainthood of 103 martyrs in Korea — the first canonization outside the Vatican in modern times, Pacific island hopping in Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands, a major inter-faith dialogue in predominantly Buddhist Thailand and a visit to an Indonesian refugee center outside Bangkok.

The pope launched an appeal Friday for unification of Communist North Korea with the South and said he was making the trip as an "apostle of peace" for the divided Korean peninsula. The pope's appeal, a major inter-faith dialogue in South Korea by the country's state-run broadcasting system.

"To possible criticism (of the visit) by authorities in the North and their allies, we can respond by saying that he (the pope) would be quite willing to go also to the North, if he is invited," said the Rev. Sesto Quercetti, deputy director of the Vatican Radio.

Local authorities are taking extraordinary steps to ensure the pope's safety after intelligence reports that major international terrorist groups were plotting an attack against him during the trip.

Vatican and diplomatic sources said the reports had been put together by U.S. and Italian intelligence services and given to the Vatican. Among the terrorist groups cited in the reports are Turkey's Neo-Nazi Gray Wolves and the notorious Venezuelan terrorist Carlos, whose real name is Ilich Ramirez Sanchez, the sources said.

The reports indicated the terrorist groups planned to enter South Korea from neighboring Japan, with possible assistance from elements close to North Korea, the sources said.

In South Korea, President Chun Doo-hwan has ordered a full-scale anti-terrorism alert and assigned elite presidential guards to protect the pontiff. Some 3,000 policemen have reportedly been brought to Seoul from provinces.

The beefed-up security also has been seen as an effort to keep student anti-government demonstrations, which have been going on for weeks, from getting out of hand.

The Thai government has assigned the military to handle papal security. In Papua New Guinea, authorities even ordered the tribesmen of the highlands to leave their bows and arrows at home when they greet the pope.

During his first trip to Asia in 1981, John Paul visited the Philippines, Guam, Japan and made refueling stops in Karachi, Pakistan, and Anchorage, Alaska.

Here are brief sketches of the upcoming papal stops:

SOUTH KOREA

Propaganda Fide, the Vatican's missionary service, says the pope will find in South Korea "a dynamic church, developing at a rate unprecedented in Asia or in other continents, a church which today constitutes a concrete hope for the church in Asia and for the universal church."

During the past three decades, the 200-year-old South Korean church has been growing at nearly 10 percent a year, with a present strength of more than 1.6 million out of South Korea's 40 million population. Neighboring Japan, with 118 million people, counts only 300,000 Catholics, more than 400 years after the arrival of missionaries.

Vatican officials predict the number of South Korean Catholics will double in about eight years, surpassing Indonesia to become the second-largest Catholic country in East Asia after the Philippines.

With the pope's endorsement, Korean church leaders have picked reconciliation as the theme for his one-day visit to Kwangju, the scene of bloody anti-government riots in 1980 which killed nearly 200 people by the official account.

He is also scheduled to visit Taegu and Pusan to address industrial workers, farmers, fishermen and youths, visit a leper's colony on a remote island and preside over the canonization of 103 martyrs — 93 Korean and 10 French — in Seoul on May 6.

In a move seen in some circles as an effort to create a favorable image on human rights before the pope's visit, the South Korean government recently has relaxed controls on political dissidents. Police have been removed from campuses which have been a stronghold of opposition to Chun's 4-year-old rule.

PAPUA NEW GUINEA & THE SOLOMON ISLANDS

The pope will spend two days in Papua New Guinea, a country of 3 million people, north of Australia. He is expected to be greeted by thousands of people, beating drums and shells in the traditional tribal greeting to a chief.

John Paul also will make a brief stop in Mount Hagen in the highlands where spears, bows and arrows, grass skirts and tribal warfare are still customary. There are about 40,000 Catholics in Port Moresby, the capital, and 700,000 in the highlands.

On May 9, he will pay a day-long visit to the Solomon Islands where about a fifth of the 200,000 people are Catholics.

Vatican sources said the pope has been studying pidgin English, a simplified form of English used by South Pacific natives.

THAILAND

The pope will spend May 10-11 in Thailand. The high point will be his visit to Phnat Nikhom camp, temporary home for 17,000 Vietnamese, Cambodian and Laotian refugees.

The pontiff will also meet with King Bhumipol Adulyadej, a devout Buddhist, and the supreme patriarch Ariyawongsakatyam, leader of Thailand's Buddhists representing 94 percent of the 49 million population. Roman Catholics are estimated at 200,000.

Reagan

mel and Chinese science commissioner Jia Weiwei.

Consent is required under the U.S. atomic energy act, designed to prevent nuclear materials from being used in atomic weapons. There were fears that China might transfer nuclear equipment or know-how to North Korea or Pakistan.

Premier Zhao spoke Friday of a "cooperative spirit" on both sides and said, "Finally we have found a solution which conforms to China's sovereignty as well as to the laws of the United States. I'm satisfied with it."

One Chinese official, who declined to be named, said the reprocessing issue would not arise for nearly a decade, since plants had to be built and operating for some time before there was any spent fuel. He said the agreement was worded delicately.

Washington was reassured when China joined the International Atomic Energy Agency and when Zhao said in January, "We do not engage in nuclear proliferation ourselves, nor do we help other countries develop nuclear weapons."

Reagan and the Chinese premier also were signing a 1984-85 implementing accord for cultural exchanges, formally renewing a pact first agreed upon in 1979 and ending a rift that began last April when Washington granted asylum to Chinese woman tennis star Hu Na.

China retaliated by withdrawing from 10 international sports tournaments in the United States and canceling eight government-sponsored exchanges, including a "Star Wars" film festival and Brooklyn Museum art exhibit.

The Brooklyn collection is now in China to mark the reopening of cultural ties, and the film festival has been rescheduled next winter.

Reagan and Zhao will also sign an agreement to prevent firms and individuals from being taxed by both countries on the same income.

It also cuts to 10 percent or less the tax on dividends, interest and royalties, which is now 30 percent for Chinese firms in the United States and 20 percent for U.S. companies in China.

The sale of defensive weapons to Taiwan has obstructed U.S. relations with China ever since 1979, when Washington recognized the communist regime in Peking.

The Taiwan relations act of April 1979 permits "unofficial" U.S. contacts with Taiwan, including arms sales.

In August 1982, the Reagan administration promised China it would reduce those sales in quantity and quality leading to a "final resolution" of the problem.

But the Chinese complain that the reductions are too small — down from about $790 million this year to $760 million in 1985 — with no final cut-off in sight.

Judge challenges rule enforcing draft-aid law

By The College Press Service

Women and some older male students don't have to sign a form swearing they've registered for the draft in order to get financial aid, a federal judge has ruled.

And until the judge clarifies his ruling with a court order sometime this week, some believe the whole financial aid office mechanism for enforcing the controversial Solomon Amendment may have to be shelved.

U.S. District Judge Robert Keeton has ruled that three Boston University students, a man born before 1960 and two women, didn't have to sign their draft compliance forms before being able to get federal financial aid.

Until now, the U.S. Department of Education has required all students to sign a form swearing they'd registered for the military draft. If they didn't sign, they wouldn't get aid.

"Judge Keeton ruled that the secretary of education expanded coverage of the (Solomon Amendment) well beyond the terms of the law," Marjorie Heins, the attorney who represented the three Boston University students, said.

The Solomon Amendment applies only to "males born after 1960," she said.

Two of the students — Jane Lipfert and Amy Harris — refused to sign the compliance forms on the grounds that, as women, they shouldn't have to do so. They estimate they lost some $2,500 in aid as the result. A third student, Michael Alexander, did sign the compliance form despite being born before 1960, but later joined the two women in challenging the regulations.

Keeton agreed the Department of Education's rules shouldn't apply to these students.

In striking down the regulations, which the department used to enforce the Solomon Amendment, Keeton did not rule on the draft-aid law itself.

The U.S. Supreme Court is expected to rule on the draft-aid law's constitutionality this spring or summer.

But Keeton's ruling could force the Education Department to adopt new regulations for enforcing the law.

"The Education Department is looking into it," department spokesman Duncan Helmrich said. "There's nothing I can tell you officially other than we wish it hadn't happened."

Reagan finds capitalism on China tour

By The Associated Press

XIAN, China — President Reagan flew 600 miles to dusty central China on Sunday, and drove 47 miles past farms and spruced-up peasant villages to see a display of terra cotta statues of warriors and a market staged by Chinese authorities for his visit.

Capitalism, he said after visiting the miniature market of souvenirs and vegetables, is "flourishing" in the People's Republic of China.

The president and his wife, Nancy, turned into tourists for the day to examine the 2,000-year-old terra cotta figures discovered in 1974 at the burial site of Qin Shi Huang Di, the first emperor of China, who ruled from 221 B.C. to 210 B.C.

The day gave the president an opportunity to glimpse, albeit from a speeding American limousine, life in a corner of rural China, where peasants live in compounds of mud and brick cottages, chickens stroll about courtyards and farmers tend communal wheat fields and small private vegetable plots.

Today, the president wraps up his visit to Peking with a formal farewell ceremony at the Great Hall of the People, and the signing, by aides, of cultural, commercial nuclear cooperation and investment agreements. Then, he and his wife are flying to Shanghai, before returning to the United States on Tuesday.

At the archeological site, the Reagans stepped down a temporary staircase to walk among the 6-foot-tall warrior figures, each bearing a different facial expression, hair style and costume. He playfully rested his chin on one headless soldier, placing his own head atop the torso. Mrs. Reagan slapped the rump of one of the soldiers' horses.

The 6,000 figures of soldiers and horses are placed in a rectangular battle formation, in one of several burial pits guarding the tomb.

The day was as neatly planned as the three days of diplomatic meetings Reagan has held in Peking, as the president viewed the figures, posed for pictures, visited the market and posed for pictures again.

The hamlets through which Reagan passed are gathering points for "free" markets, at which the peasants can sell produce and other goods privately, under China's liberalized economic program. The markets rotate among three or four towns in a rural area, said a White House briefing paper.

White House officials had hoped that Reagan would be able to visit a market in the town of Gao Ling, along his motorcade route through Shaanxi province. But Chinese authorities objected, and instead moved a sample of the market — a display of cabbages, scallions and potatoes — to the vicinity of the souvenir stand.

When a reporter asked Reagan what he thought about capitalism in this communist nation, he responded, "It's flourishing."

Is it the wave of the future, he was asked.

"Ask them," Reagan replied, pointing to the sellers.

underneath the house, then looked back and saw the back of the trailer torn up."

Fire Capt. F.J. Larry said nobody was in the trailer that was most seriously damaged by the twister.

"We checked it to make sure it was clear," he said. "There was just that little dog there sitting out front pretty scared by the storm."

Strong winds tore the roof off a Wichita toy store, and merchandise inside was damaged by heavy rain, Beaver said.

Vehicles were flipped over, windows were blown and tree limbs were downed across the city, according to Beaver.

Several houses in the nearby town of Belle Aire had their roofs damaged, Beaver said.

Tornadoes also were reported in Rose Hill, Haysville and at a small airport near Derby as well as other rural areas of Sedgwick County, Mills said. No significant damage was reported, although aircraft were believed damaged at the airport, he said.

High winds struck Cowley County, damaging the roof at the Auditorium-Gymnasium in Arkansas City and tearing down tree limbs and power lines.

The Cowley County cities of Arkansas City and Winfield each lost power for more than an hour, authorities said.

"Our spotters have counted seven different funnel clouds," said Judy Smith, a spokeswoman for the Cowley County Civil Defense office.

"We have a lot of tree damage and power lines down."

A "rash" of tornadoes and funnel clouds struck Butler County, but caused no significant damage, said a sheriff's dispatcher who would not give her name.

A funnel cloud was spotted over Overland Park in the Kansas City metropolitan area, and strong winds broke windows in businesses and damaged a roof at a shopping center, said Sgt. Ray Palatto. A recreational vehicle and other vehicles were overturned, he said.

Radio station KGGF in Coffeyville measured winds gusts up to 100 mph early Sunday afternoon, and gusts stayed well above 50 mph throughout the day. Three cars were overturned and several trees were uprooted there. Power was lost in parts for Coffeyville Sunday afternoon.

In northwest Kansas, seven inches of heavy, wet snow fell at Goodland. The National Weather Service at Topeka said the snow stopped falling short of the 10 inches forecast for the area.

In Mannford, Okla., four churches filled with parishioners were hit by a tornado Sunday, sending some worshipers into closets and under pews and leaving at least one person dead. Fifty people were hurt in two towns.

Destruction in Mannford was within a six-block area, said Chief of Police Orlin White. Two schools also were destroyed, he said.

The four churches — all within a block of each other — were either in the midst of services or about to start them when the twister hit, he said.

"It was so dark in the church, then it got light, and it was the roof coming off," said Beverly Varnell, who was in the First Baptist Church when the tornado hit. "We just heard that horrible rumbling. The next thing we knew, things were flying around us."

Dozens of vehicles in church parking lots were picked up by the storm and smashed down on top of each other. Some were left unrecognizable because they'd been rolled into a huge, steel ball.

First Baptist Church and Assembly of God Church were destroyed, officials said. Church of the Nazarene was partially destroyed, and a fourth was only slightly damaged.

Turner, senate chairman, casting the deciding vote to break a 26-26 tie.

Turner said he made his decision based on the program's ability to continue without the aid of student funds and the fact that there was not a significant number of votes in favor of the amendment.

Two more attempts were made to amend the allocation for Early Childhood Laboratory. After some controversial parliamentary maneuvers by several senators, both amendments were removed from consideration by Turner.

Senators allocated $5,300 for honorariums to pay special speakers brought to campus by student organizations. Black Student Union received $2,500 and Puerto Rican Student Organization received $800.

ICC received $1,400 for honorariums, a $400 increase from the Finance Committee recommendation. MEChA was allocated $600, a decrease from what was recommended.

posed $864 be allocated to Early Childhood Laboratory to provide part of a salary for a graduate assistant. ECL had originally requested $2,470.

Kerry Jones, home economics senator, argued for reconsideration of Early Childhood Laboratory because of the student response she had received after senate decided not to fund the group.

Deever said because Early Childhood Laboratory does not serve many students, it was not a priority.

"A lot of people came up to me after we cut funding for Early Childhood Laboratory and complained about it. But when I explained to them that we're only talking about 18 children, they changed their mind," she said.

Lebanese unity plan falls apart

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Prime Minister-designate Rashid Karami announced Monday the formation of a "national unity" Cabinet to steer the nation out of civil war, but within an hour the plan appeared to be falling apart.

One key Moslem nominee said he would not serve and two major Christian leaders planned to meet today and decide whether they would accept the appointments.

Shells and rockets hit Beirut homes and shops, frustrating efforts to establish a cease-fire during the political reorganization. Fighting in Beirut tapered off, however, about an hour before Karami made his announcement at 8:20 p.m. The prime minister named the 10-man Cabinet of five Moslems and five Christians over state radio.

The unity Cabinet would include the four leaders of the warring factions — Christians Camille Chamoun and Pierre Gemayel, Shiite Moslem Nabih Berri and Druse leader Walid Jumblatt.

But Berri, who was to be minister of justice and electricity and water resources, said the portfolios given the opposition leaders "are far from any connection with political decision-making." He added, "I refuse to participate in the Cabinet and I apologize for not accepting this post."

Former President Camille Chamoun, head of the right-wing Christian National Liberal Party, told reporters, "I have learned about it (the Cabinet) from the press. I was not officially informed."

He said he would meet today with his ally, Pierre Gemayel, leader of the Christian Phalange Party and father of President Amin Gemayel, to decide if they would serve or not. Under Karami's proposal, Chamoun would be the minister of finance and housing and Pierre Gemayel would have the communications and health portfolio.

There was no immediate response from Jumblatt, who would be the minister of public works, transportation and tourism. The five other ministers would be one Sunni Moslem, one Shiite Moslem, two members of the Greek Orthodox community and one Greek Catholic.

Karami is a Sunni Moslem and President Gemayel is a Maronite Christian. Under Lebanese tradition, the president is a Christian and the prime minister a Sunni Moslem, the nation's largest Moslem sect.

Karami said he would serve as prime minister and foreign minister.

Day care lab to expand enrollment

Senate funding decrease leads to center's fee hike

By MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

A lack of funding from Student Senate for the Early Childhood Laboratory will result in a broadening of the facility's guidelines for enrollment and acceptance of a wider variety of applicants.

That is the consensus of Beverly Briggs, assistant professor of family and child development, and Marjorie Stith, professor of family and child development. Stith is the current director of child care programs on campus. Briggs will begin her appointment as director July 1.

Briggs said the program is a carefully planned environment that deals with the developmental levels of children. Functions of the program include research, teaching and service.

Margaret Adams, instructor of family and child development, is the supervising instructor in the program. She is helped by a graduate assistant and several student teachers. Children in the laboratory follow a learning program to help them develop cognitively, socially and physically, Briggs said.

Stith said she was "disappointed" in senate's decision to completely cut funding for the program. Senate allocated funds from student fees to the program for 11 years before cutting funding for the program.

"They've made a statement to the campus and to the administration that student government is not interested in child care for married students with children," Stith said.

Stith said the program's commitment has changed because student government has chosen to no longer be involved. She said it used to be a program for students.

"Our commitment now is to the University community," Stith said. "We cannot be a student priority program without student government input."

The laboratory will now have to make applications for enrollment of children available to faculty and staff members. This may make it more difficult for students' children to participate in the program since there will be more people vying for the open spaces, Stith said.

There are currently 18 children from ages 3 to 5 enrolled in the laboratory program.

"Our program is going to continue, although it's been a great help (to have student government funding)," Stith said.

Fees for enrollment in the program will be raised from $2.75 to $3.50 per day, Briggs said. In the past, the program operated on funding through student government, user fees and the Department of Family and Child Development.

Kirk Porteous, senior in radio and television and senate Finance Committee chairman, said the program was cut for several reasons. He said it was a tight year fiscally, and senate was forced to fund programs according to their priority.

Porteous also said many people overlooked the fact that the program is still going to exist, even without student funding. Porteous denied the allegation that senate does not care about child care.

Hayden reflects on session

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Republican Speaker Mike Hayden said Monday criticism by Democratic Gov. John Carlin of his leadership in the House in the closing days of the legislative session "isn't even worth responding to."

Carlin told a news conference as the 1984 session ended Sunday night he thought Hayden had "lost control" of the House and accused the GOP speaker of being an obstructionist in not allowing full debate on the prison funding package.

"I'm not in this process to look for any compliments from the governor," Hayden told his news conference.

"The governor and I have a lot of differences on the public policy of this state. But I respect his views and I would hope he would respect mine."

As far as the allegation the House was "out of control," the speaker said, "All's well that ends well. It all came together."

"I call the omnibus appropriations bill the 'disappointment bill,' because people want to see the funding included for their pet projects and they are unhappy when it isn't included, Hayden told reporters.

Hayden, who said he will run for re-election in the 120th House District in far northwest Kansas this year and expects to be re-elected speaker without opposition in the House GOP caucus, listed his two major disappointments of the session as:

— Failure of the Senate to approve a proposed constitutional amendment to make the state Board of Education appointed rather than elected after the House gave the proposition two-thirds support.

— Failure of the Senate to vote on a bill to raise the drinking age for 3.2 percent beer from 18 to 19.

He said he felt his refusal to allow expansion of the Kansas Court of Appeals, which would have opened up a seat for appointment of Republican Sen. Elwayne Pomeroy of Topeka to the bench, was the key factor in loss of the Board of Education amendment.

"My feeling is there are certain principles that have no price," Hayden said of his adamant opposition to court expansion.

Asked if he was convinced the adverse reaction of senators to his stand against court expansion prevented the Board of Education amendment from being considered in the Senate, Hayden replied: "It was strictly that."

"I have a conviction that we who are in public office should not use our positions to personal advantage," he said. "I'm not willing to trade that off."

He said President Ross Doyen never asked him to support court expansion as a condition for Senate consideration of the Board of Education amendment, but "a number of senators" did.

While Doyen never asked, Hayden said, the lack of strong support from anyone in the Senate leadership was a major factor in the amendment's demise.

"What it lacked in the Senate was there were no strong advocates among the leadership," he said. The support was "lukewarm at best, and that's probably the major reason" it failed.

He said he will push again in the 1985 session for submission of an amendment to make the state board appointed instead of elected because he feels so strongly about the policy change.

Hayden said Carlin shares his view, and he thinks Kansas-National Education Association will back the proposal once it studies it thoroughly.

He said the effort to raise the beer drinking age "just ran out of time."

"There are so many pieces in that puzzle. You have to put all those pieces in place. The clock simply ran out on it," Hayden said.

The issue will be back before the Legislature in 1985, Hayden said, but it will remain aimed at raising the age just to 19. He said he sees little chance Kansas will move to raise the age to 21 because of legislators' concerns over enforcing a higher age ban.

Hayden called 1984 "a good session, on balance," noting progress the Legislature made on reappraisal and classification, steps taken to address the prison overcrowding problem and the authority given the Corporation Commission to deal with the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant rate increases.

He called the Wolf Creek legislation "good public policy," but said it is not an issue "in which the Legislature has ultimate power."

Telefund tops 1983 pledges

By KATHY WOODWORTH
Collegian Reporter

Faculty and student volunteers for the 1984 KSU Foundation Telefund have raised pledges which exceed last year's pledges by $44,000 through telephone contacts made to 13,800 K-State alumni.

The total funds raised during last year's drive was $281,000, which was topped by this year's total of $325,000.

Telefund contacts were made to alumni by seven of the University's eight colleges. Tom Carlin, director of communications for the Foundation, said each college dean determines how the money is spent, and they all chose to return the money to students in the form of scholarships and materials to improve the quality of education.

"Five colleges donated 100 percent of their money to scholarships," Carlin said. Those five were the colleges of Arts and Sciences, Architecture and Design, Education, Engineering and Home Economics.

The College of Agriculture donated 50 percent to scholarships and 40 percent to student projects, with the remaining 10 percent going toward operational needs.

The College of Business Administration put its money toward the purchase of new computers.

"It's a little hard to say if we'll receive more in cash contributions than was pledged like we've done in previous years, but we have a good shot at it. The money is continuing to come in," Carlin said.

Total pledges for the seven participating colleges were: Agriculture, $50,585; Arts and Sciences, $82,391; Architecture and Design, $18,385; Business Administration, $38,258; Education, $30,580; Engineering, $66,818; and Home Economics, $38,096.

Carlin said the size of each college's alumni group explains the difference in the dollar amount pledged, and he said he felt they (colleges) were all successful.

The 1,000 volunteers who contacted the alumni were mostly students.

Carlin said the student volunteers were recruited through their colleges. The college coordinator chose a team captain, and the captain was

Museum to depict atrocities

Jews honor Holocaust dead

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Survivors of Nazi horrors gathered in a dreary rain Monday to begin transforming two death camp-like buildings into a U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum that will show "the dark side of human civilization."

The symbolic ground-breaking for the $100 million, privately financed museum near the Washington Monument was a focus of the annual Days of Remembrance for the 6 million Jews and countless other European minorities slaughtered and persecuted under Adolf Hitler.

"If you remember, you shall live," said Elie Wiesel, who survived Auschwitz and came to America to write, teach, campaign for human rights and become chairman of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council.

Wiesel told Vice President George Bush and more than 400 people at a noontime commemoration in the Capitol Rotunda that memories of the death camps provide lessons for now and warnings for the future.

"The world unleashed madness more than 40 years ago, and that madness is still dominating the minds and souls of too many countries," Wiesel said.

"No cause is more noble, no endeavor more sacred," he said, than to offer future visitors a graphic portrait not only of "the inhumanity of the killer but also the humanity of his victims."

Wiesel and other survivors are raising funds to create a memorial illustrating the horrors of genocide and the daily lives of death camp victims. There also will be computerized archives of Nazi extermination records seized by the United States after World War II.

Seen by Wiesel as a "magnet for all who visit Washington," the museum will be housed in two century-old buildings, donated by the U.S. government.

Campus news briefs

Professor announces airbrush class

David Harmes, assistant instructor of art, has announced a six-week summer course offering in Graphic Design and Illustration, which will focus on airbrush techniques.

Students desiring to enroll in the class, which will run from June 5 to July 11, should sign up on a waiting list in Harmes' office to get a place in the class during registration on June 4. Harmes said the prerequisites for the course, to be held from 9 a.m. to noon Monday through Thursday, include Drawing I and Graphic Design I.

Due to the popularity and success of the airbrush course during its debut last summer, Harmes advises potential students to sign early for the class, which he said will be limited to 35 participants.

Interested students can contact Harmes at 532-6605 or visit him at his office in Art Building 204C.

Coretta King to speak at program

Coretta Scott King, widow of the late Dr. Martin Luther King, will be the principal speaker May 17 and 18 in programs at Washburn University, marking the 30th anniversary of the landmark school desegregation decision, Brown vs. Topeka Board of Education.

King will speak at 8 p.m. May 17 in White Concert Hall.

Seventeen K-State students were recognized for outstanding achievement and accomplishment by the Division of Biology at a spring awards banquet.

"Most promising" students in biology are Donna Fox, junior in biology; Brian Hunt, junior in milling science and management; and Stephen Marshall, junior in pre-medicine. These undergraduate students were recognized through a program established and financed by members of the biology faculty for undergraduate biology students.

Ten undergraduate students were recipients of Cancer Research Scholarships in the Center for Basic Center Research, Division of Biology. The Cancer Research Awards are funded through private contributions to the center.

Keith Sumner, senior in pre-medicine, received the 1984 H. Henley Haymaker Award for Excellence in Biology. Marijo Wilson, graduate in biology, received the H. Henley Haymaker Graduate Research Award.

Daniel Mulhern, graduate in biology, received the James Ackert Graduate Student Scientific Award.

Mark Heinrich, graduate in biology, received the Michael Scott Watkins Award for Excellence in Teaching by a graduate student in biology.

University for Man is now looking for volunteers to lead summer classes, which will begin June 20.

Interested people who have a skill or knowledge they wish to share with others in an informal setting should contact UFM at 532-5866. The deadline for submitting course descriptions for the summer catalog is Friday.

Class leaders are needed for all sections of the catalog, especially these subject areas: home improvements, dancing, modern languages, photography, typing, computers, auto and bicycle maintenance, genealogy, children's classes and sports.

ITI honors 'Exporters of the Year'

Beech Aircraft of Wichita and Tallgrass Technologies Corp. of Overland Park were honored recently as "Kansas Exporters of the Year" at the International Trade Institute/International Trade Council's 10th Annual Trade Conference.

The ITI is a division of K-State's College of Business Administration.

Beech Aircraft was recognized in the "over $30 million in exports" category, while Tallgrass Technologies Corp. received the award for smaller firms with important overseas markets. Gov. John Carlin presented plaques to representatives of each firm.

Summer school offers special course format

By TOM STALLBAUMER
Collegian Reporter

With less than a week of school left, some students are busy preparing to get out of school for the summer. Other students will choose to stay in Manhattan and attend summer school.

Registration and enrollment for summer school will begin at 8 a.m. June 4.

Resident fees for summer school are $37 per credit hour and non-resident fees are $90 per credit hour, for both undergraduate and graduate students.

"Summer school is different than school during the fall and spring semesters," Doug Hurley, associate registrar, said. "During summer school, there are eight-week courses, as well as other special courses that may run anywhere from one to four weeks."

"The on-campus classes are held right here on campus, and enrollment and registration are taken care of in the Union. The off-campus classes are held throughout the state of Kansas, and registration is handled through the Office of Continuing Education," Hurley said.

"Last year, enrollment for summer school was 6,086 students, which was broken down into 1,265 off-campus students and 4,821 on-campus students. We (the University) don't expect any significant changes for this summer session," he said.

The fees for off-campus classes are $29 per undergraduate credit hour and $45 per graduate credit hour.

"There is a new policy beginning next summer which will make both on-campus and off-campus fees the same," Hurley said.

"There is one area in the summer school line schedule which usually causes some confusion," Hurley said. "This is toward the back of the schedule and concerns classes in the Community Activities Program. These classes are offered through Continuing Education, therefore the fee schedule is that for off-campus classes, and the fees must be paid over in Umberger Hall. The confusion arises because the classes are actually taught on-campus."

"The goal of the University is to schedule all classes for the summer term to be held in air-conditioned rooms. The only time this is not possible is when certain equipment is necessary for that class, such as in a lab class," Hurley said.

Robert Evans, director of Student Financial Assistance, said there is still financial assistance available for summer school.

"There are still Pell Grants and Guaranteed Student Loans available. Applications for National Direct Student Loans and for work-study are no longer being accepted," Evans said.

"The Pell Grants are still available for students with unused eligibility. This means that during either the fall or spring semester, they did not attend school full time," he said.

"For students interested in the Guaranteed Student Loan program, the student will have to fill out an application, and then meet with an adviser in the financial aid office. That allows the student to learn right away whether or not they are eligible for a Guaranteed Student Loan," he said. "There are a number of factors which determine eligibility, such as the number of hours being taken and the student's residency."

Brett Lambert, sophomore in pre-law, won the grand prize which was a Commodore 64 color computer purchased through the Foundation fund. Lambert had a total of 48 pledges.

"If they (the laboratory) really knew that there was a need for student child care, they would keep it a student priority program," Porteous said.

Senators also examined cost benefit allowance, Porteous said. The benefit to the 30 students with children in the program is small compared to other programs which also benefit students, he said.

"It's just not worth the money in a time of tight budgets," he said.

Parks photographs Manhattan, will donate work to University

By BRAD STUCKY
Collegian Reporter

Small groups of well-dressed people hovered about the room at the Manhattan Union National bank, sipping punch and talking quietly. They strolled casually, looking at the photographs hanging on the walls. Cameras were brought out and readied for the soon-to-arrive guest. Everyone turned as he walked in.

The guest of the reception was Gordon Parks, former Life magazine photographer and native Kansan.

Parks has been in Manhattan for the past week on a photography assignment to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the Manhattan Mercury. The photographs will later be donated to an existing collection of Parks' work owned by the University.

Parks was hired by the newspaper to take the commemorative centennial photographs for a special section to be published May 9. He is working alone to capture the people of Manhattan.

Parks said the subject material for the project is varied: "clouds, houses, details, a bug on the wall, anything I see."

Parks was introduced Sunday to a round of applause and endless introductions. Parents took their children to meet him and photographers positioned themselves carefully around him.

One woman asked him to autograph a copy of "The Learning Tree." A friend introduced him as the "Heavyweight Champion of the Photographic World," and he stepped up to the desk to speak. He talked very quietly, almost competing with the background music.

During his short speech, Parks said Manhattan is like a second home to him. In 1970 he was awarded an honorary degree of Doctors and Letters at K-State.

"What do you want me to say? I'm glad to be here and see some of my old pictures again. Someone asked me why I'm always so busy. I told them that I have three ex-wives, and that keeps me creative."

Many of Parks' photographs depict poverty, a remembrance of his childhood in Fort Scott, where his father was a poor farmer. Photographs in his "Moments without Proper Names" collection showed scenes from Harlem in New York City; Rio de Janeiro, Brazil; and Kansas.

Almost all of his photographs show people, both the rich and famous and the poor. Among the photographs of Malcolm X and Parisian fashion models are shots of slums. Many of his photographs taken in Rio de Janeiro are centered on a small boy named Flavio from a poor family.

Aside from his photography, Parks has published 16 books, collections of photographs and articles. Included in these is "The Learning Tree," which has been transformed into a film. In addition, Parks has written the screenplays for four other films, including "Shaft" and "Leadbelly." He also has composed four musical scores.

Parks, who is 71, began his career in 1937. Inspired by a newsreel, he bought his first camera for $12.50. In Martin H. Bush's book "The Photographs of Gordon Parks," Parks describes his first experience: "I went down to Puget Sound, shot my first sequences of seagulls, and fell into Puget Sound. But I held the camera."

"When I got back to Minneapolis I had the film developed at an Eastman Kodak shop. He liked what he saw and said, 'Well, if you shoot some more, we'll give you a show.' And they did — on 5th Street in Minneapolis...That was my start as a photographer."

In 1942 the struggling photographer received a fellowship from the Julius Rosenwald Foundation that entitled him to study under Roy Stryker.

Stryker became his mentor and introduced Parks to famous photographers of the time. After World War II, he joined a filming team with the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey to photograph life in America at mid-century.

Life magazine offered Parks a job as full-time staff photographer. He worked for the magazine until 1970, when he left to pursue his films and paint.

Iowa saves with aluminum cans

Many recycling programs have been implemented by different states to combat litter. Kansans have been smashing aluminum cans, stashing newspapers for Boy Scouts and returning pop bottles to grocery stores for deposit. In Oregon and Iowa there is a mandatory deposit system for recycling aluminum.

Stamped in bold black letters on top of the aluminum beverage can are the words, "IOWA REFUND 5 CENTS." Iowans receive a refund for returning cans as well as bottles to the supermarket.

This sounds like a strong incentive to recycle aluminum. Imagine how many people would take the trouble to get their "deposit" returned if 30 to 60 cents were tacked on top of the price of every six-pack bought in Manhattan. The end result would also be fewer cans littering the streets.

While the goals of Iowa, Oregon and Kansas are the same, Kansas has decided to approach the problem differently. Beer wholesalers, soft drink distributors and grocery store managers have formed a group called the Kansas Beverage Industry Recycling Program. BIRP shows individual companies how to operate a recycling center, including how to market, promote and sell recycled materials.

Unlike the mandatory deposit states whose legislation affects only the beverage industry, BIRP is a total program working for the recycling of aluminum, glass and paper products. Under this system, ketchup and mayonnaise bottles could be recycled along with empty Kleenex and french fry boxes.

To be recognized as a BIRP center, companies must recycle aluminum and glass, while paper is optional. The organization Keep America Beautiful estimated that 20 percent of America's litter is cans and bottles.

Formed one year ago, Kansas BIRP has opened eight recycling centers and 25 satellite centers for communities that aren't large enough to require daily recycling needs.

Campbell Distributors in Manhattan currently pays 31 cents per pound for aluminum only. But plans are under way for a BIRP center to be in operation in Manhattan soon, said Chiquita Cornelius, executive director of BIRP.

The mandatory deposit system creates problems. Beverage prices may increase because the cans have to be handled twice. Grocery stores must have extra personnel working to process the returned cans as well as extensive storage space for the aluminum.

But the mandatory system hits people in the pocketbook, causing more concern for conservation. With the system Kansas has now, it is up to the few who want to recycle cans to keep the streets clean for everyone else.

Costs jeopardize health care

The United States is proud of its ever-expanding and increasingly complex medical technology. In recent years, great advances have been made in finding cures for diseases, transplanting organs and diagnosing cancer.

There are few diseases besides cancer that medicine has not been able to overcome in recent years. Perhaps only the common cold can stand with cancer as being an insurmountable affliction. Medical advances in this century have eased or nearly eliminated the threat of polio, malaria and tuberculosis. Organ transplants are common. And now scientists are on the verge of discovering a cure for AIDS, a threat in today's society.

All these medical advances are hailed as life-saving and miraculous. But as with all new technology, immediate developments are expensive. Add to this the increasingly high costs for all medical and hospital services, and the price of health becomes overwhelming.

But of what value is such advanced technology and sophisticated health services if no one can afford them when needed? Insurance makes health care more affordable, but policy costs have risen to keep pace with medical bills. It's a vicious cycle, with the ill caught in the vortex. Perhaps costs should be re-examined to provide reasonable health care instead of expensive medical innovations.

Who will forgive us our debts?

The other day I received two letters, one from Zaire and one from Bolivia. Aside from specific news, the messages they carried were the same: each economy is in the worst shape it has been in decades. There have been many factors contributing to the problem, but the single most powerful, and frightening, is the foreign debt.

Many basic food staples are not to be found. Or, when they can be found, they are too expensive. In some cases, prices in Bolivia have increased 40 times over in the last three years, which is 4,000 percent inflation.

My sister-in-law calculated that a subsistence budget for a family of two in Bolivia was 180,000 pesos. The average salary right now is about 100,000 pesos, yet families average five members. Arithmetic, in this case, does not make sense — the only product of these numbers seems to be hardship.

Virtually every country has chalked up enormous debts with western banks. Even substantially "developed" countries such as Brazil and Argentina have staggering debts: $70 billion and $43 billion respectively. "Eastern-bloc" countries such as Poland and Cuba are in similar straits, with debts of $38 billion and $12 billion respectively.

But the hardest-hit countries are the "less developed countries" such as Zaire and Bolivia. Similar countries, Tanzania for example, have debts equal to one-half of their gross national product. In other countries, the entire earnings from exports is not enough to pay even the interest on their international loans.

While these problems may appear distant, in many regards U.S. farmers are in an analogous situation. In 1980, total farm debt in this country was calculated at $159 billion. The average farm debt was almost $100,000. By all accounts, this has continued to worsen.

Both Third World countries and U.S. farmers are primary producers. They make their living producing raw goods for which other people dictate the prices. Because the prices are too low, they have to produce more. This creates a surplus, which brings down the price. Yet to produce the surplus, they have to go deeper into debt.

U.S. citizens on the average spend only 10 to 20 percent of their income on food. Cheap food is part of the "American Dream." But in practice, farmers are not making a profit — they are going further and further into debt while we continue to demand cheap food.

People here can afford third, fourth and fifth family cars, because cars are "too" cheap. That is, the raw material in our manufactured goods has been bought from Third World countries at unrealistically low prices. Those countries are not making a profit; they are (involuntarily) going into debt so we can have cheap cars.

In a few words, both U.S. farmers and less developed countries are subsidizing the U.S. lifestyle by incurring huge debts.

While I'm on the subject, I cannot neglect to mention the national debt in this country. I have seen it calculated that if the national debt were parcelled out to every child, woman and man it would amount to $13,000 per person.

It seems that much of the world is like Farmer Bob. He has a beautiful, completely modern house and is driving a shiny new pickup. Yet he is up to his rear-view mirror in debt. He is living today on the expected profit of tomorrow.

How can this be? How can everybody be so deeply in debt? Who or what is on the other side? Where has all that money gone? What hole has swallowed the results of the labor of people all over the world?

At the heart of the debt crisis is unrealistic expectations. On one hand there is the American Dream. This says that one can attain any level of material wealth by working hard and reading the Wall Street Journal.

On the other hand, much of the Third World is sinking into debt in an illusive quest to match the U.S. standard of living. Much of the credit extended to these countries has gone, directly or indirectly, into western-style housing, pleasure automobiles and other non-necessities.

I believe the situation will continue to get worse — unless people can severely curtail their material expectations in life. At the same time, we must recognize the effect of our relations with less endowed countries.

It all boils down to what Mahatma Gandhi once said: "The world can provide for every man's need, but not for every man's greed."

Maternity cut indicative of senate's bias

Editor,
Re: "Maternity benefits cut from insurance plan," in the April 27 Collegian:

I am extremely disappointed with the recent Student Senate decision to exclude maternity benefits from general coverage in student health insurance.

This program is set up to reduce the cost of health insurance for those students not on mom and dad's plan and under the financial burden of attending school.

Senate has determined that a select population should pay an additional $400 for this coverage, thus increasing the cost of attending school. This group includes a portion of K-State's female population (about 44 percent of the total student population is female) and married male students.

Within the next year, some of these students will find themselves faced with an unplanned pregnancy. Therefore, they can't afford to be without maternity benefits.

This is what Brian O'Neill boils down to economic considerations for the group mentioned. Those senators who feel single males needn't share the cost of maternity benefits better have a good reason for deciding all students should pay for a coliseum some may never see.

Should some students be forced to make a choice and opt for parenthood over attending K-State, enrollment may decline. Those who decide a $400 rider is not financially feasible may view abortion as a cost-saving alternative. The cost certainly competes with a $400 rider, and encourages couples playing a type of game-of-chance.

This decision by senate, and its decision to cut funds to an already over-crowded day care facility, indicates a majority of our senators feel having children while attending school is a no-no.

This thinking denies potential parents an equal-cost opportunity to attend college and secure a brighter financial future, while at the same time forcing them to put a price on having a child. It is unfair to put family-oriented students in this position, and it is unfair to put women who become pregnant in a state of panic because they could not afford the maternity rider. I was under the impression that the educational system was set up for everyone — not just for the benefit of a select population.

Education loses with 'political' allocations

Editor,
Why can the Associated Students of Kansas lobby for political action and receive Student Senate funding, while the Coalition for Human Rights is called a "political group" and denied funding for telling K-State students that people in Central America are being brutally murdered every day?

It makes me furious when I realize my student fees go to Brett Lambert and company so they can make sure the 18-year-olds can continue to drink beer, but they can't go to a group that is providing an otherwise unavailable source of education about the flagrant abuse of the inalienable rights of millions of our neighbors on this planet.

In addition to making me furious, such highhanded legislative activity also frightens me.

In the Wednesday Collegian, Kirk Porteous said there is a fine line between political and non-political groups. That may be. But if ASK, a self-proclaimed lobbying group, takes part in the political process in Topeka, they have crossed the "Porteous Line" and should be denied funding. If not, then the Coalition, which has never lobbied in Topeka or taken any political action whatsoever, is well behind the "Porteous Line" and should be given its requested allocations.

It appears to me that certain members of senate have lost sight of the primary role of the University: education and the free exchange of ideas.

If you are here to drink beer and have a good time, fine. If, on the contrary, you are here to receive an education, I urge you to contact both the Coalition for Human Rights to investigate them for yourself, and your student senators to let them know your feelings on this vital issue. Perhaps we can finally put student government back into the hands of the students.

Snake hunts prove harmful

Editor,
Re: "Enthusiast tracks rattlers," in the April 25 Collegian:

Rattlesnake hunting is dangerous, not for the hunters but for the environment.

Snakes are major rodent predators and uncontrolled harvesting can only be good news for mice, rats and pocket gophers. And that's bad news for the plants they eat and the farmers who must cope with them.

The story failed to mention that a favorite method for extracting rattlers from their burrows is to pour gasoline down the holes. In theory, the fumes drive the snakes out of the ground, but in practice, no one really knows how many snakes and other burrow-dwellers die before reaching the surface.

This technique, plus the indiscriminate capture of individuals regardless of size or sex, makes rattlesnake hunting a very wasteful and destructive hobby.

What's more, these hunts are almost always sponsored by community groups with no expertise in game management.

Snake hunts should be prohibited until more is known about rattlesnake ecology and population dynamics. Even then, it's doubtful they are really necessary to control snake numbers.

Common courtesy helps radio DJs

Having been a program director, news director and disc jockey in several markets much larger than Manhattan, I feel qualified from my 12 years in the radio profession to render a few comments and observations concerning recent letters to the editor about radio DJs.

Radio has always been a "people" medium, and as such has moral and ethical responsibilities to obey rules of public relations and courtesy. There are too many DJs in the business today who think they are all-important and need not listen to telephone callers.

It has always been my conviction that if a listener calls in a request, the DJ should make every effort to determine when the song can be played.

If the song was played recently, this should be explained to the caller and an offer made to find another favorite of the caller. This is just plain common courtesy. To simply say, "We'll play it as soon as we can," is a very impersonal answer to a very sincere question.

A radio station's income is directly related to the ratings it receives in the annual "book," and a little bit of extra time and courtesy on the telephone can make a big difference when the final tally is out.

I can hear the moans of the disc jockeys now. "We don't have time to be friendly on the telephone; we're too busy being 'friendly' on the air." Believe me, a true pro can balance the time between studio duties and the telephone. It works in large markets, and it can work here.

One of the letters to this paper mentioned the fact that tight formats hinder the DJ's ability to fit in a song. In a format where the DJ is both engineer and announcer, or "combo," the format is a guide for categories of songs. It does not dictate which song is to be played at what time.

The DJ should have enough grasp of the format, flow and titles to estimate within a few minutes when a certain selection can be played. In a computerized, automated system, the routine is preprogrammed.

PAUL BOYD
Guest Columnist

In some cases, the DJ has some control over which selections get aired, but unfortunately, the computers have taken out the professional spontaneity in most automated setups. If this is the case, the DJ owes it to the caller to look on the playlist and tell him or her when that title will come up again. DJs shouldn't duck the issue by saying, "We'll get it on as soon as we can."

Let me also make some comments about the attitudes of listeners. It is distracting and also lacking in courtesy to call the disc jockey every few minutes requesting the same song over and over. If you do not get a satisfactory answer to your call, a letter to the general manager or program director of the radio station is a very effective tool for "fighting back."

Managers are keenly aware of the letters about the programming on their stations. They want as many listeners as possible to be happy because more listeners translate to more revenue.

In summary, a couple of suggestions:

For the DJs — prepare for your show; know what is coming up before you enter the control room. Be informed. Read as many newspapers and magazines as you can get your hands on. Plan your music to flow; don't just beat out a list of song titles.

If you work in an automated station and have no control over the playlist and no intention of playing requests, do not solicit them. It will only hurt your ratings if you do.

The second most important thing, next to reading, is to become familiar with all types of music, even if you cannot stand some of it. Then if someone requests a Harry Belafonte or Doris Day tune you do not have, you will know they are for real. These few suggestions will help you be successful in your career on the air.

For the listeners — realize the DJ is doing a job. He or she lives life three minutes at a time. If the phone rings 25 times before being answered, don't blame the DJ. There are a lot of other more important things happening during a show.

Next time you are at a dance where a DJ is playing, observe him or her for a while and you will understand the nature of the job. If you are ever in a radio station, take the time to observe the hubbub around the studio. It is a wonder anything sounds so smooth as it does on the air with all the elements which go into the production.

Do not harass the DJ. You also owe it to the DJ to be courteous on the telephone. Don't be offended if you need to be put on hold while the DJ talks into the microphone. In many operations, the DJs are not allowed to be on the telephone within two minutes of a break.

Finally, if you feel slighted or the DJ has not delivered what was promised, you have a right to send a letter to the general manager or program director.

A mutual understanding of the situation and common courtesy are beneficial to all concerned and will hopefully personalize radio stations again. It is a fact that the stations who treat listeners with the most kindness usually end up at the top of the ratings.

Researcher studies sleep difficulties

By KIMBERLY STOLLE
Collegian Reporter

Finals. That time of intense studying, desperate cramming and tortuous all-nighters will soon be upon that group of the population known as students.

Students sacrifice normal routines of classes, eating, sleeping and exercising established throughout the semester for one week of intense preparation for final exams.

But denying the body's need for routine, especially its need for sleep, to allow more time for studying may be more a hindrance than a help.

"One of the things that we realized while working with students, which isn't often recognized, are the number of people who go home after final exams who have minor to serious health problems because of the pressure of final exams," said Tim Lowenstein, founder of the Conscious Living Foundation, an organization concerned with sleeping disorders, relaxation techniques and relieving stress.

Lowenstein received degrees in accounting, family and child development and counseling at K-State.

"It's (sleeping problems) not recognized because you don't see those people anymore. But they go home and catch anything from a minor cold, to flu, to sore throat, to some very serious diseases like mononucleosis because they have just stressed themselves to the max," he said.

"So, they pay the price. Not so much during dead week or final exams week, but when they go home. They're literally exhausted," Lowenstein said.

Lowenstein, a former K-State student, has studied the effects of sound and relaxation upon the human body. His recent studies revolve around a new concept of harmonic sounds, music and relaxation to guarantee individuals of quality of good, deep sleep.

Lowenstein cited three factors that make sleep, or lack of it, a major problem, especially for students.

"One is just a sheer time problem, especially for computer-types and architect-types, who spend lots of hours, or journalism people who try to punch in that story before the deadline of that big term paper.

"It's a common problem. It's just a lack of sleep. And if you don't have enough sleep, you don't feel well, you're emotionally irritable. You don't think as clearly," he said.

"Particularly in studying, sometimes that late-night cramming is actually destructive. You forget more because of a lack of sleep than you'll remember from staying up in the wee hours of the morning, when you're so tired you're falling asleep between pages."

Another factor that contributes to sleeping problems is the lack of true, deep sleep an individual obtains. People seldom reach a deep sleep stage, but rather, are constantly shifting between stages of sleep.

"If you'll imagine a cork in a pond. It's almost like they drift down into sleep and drift back up toward the surface. They bob back down again and sleep and bob back up and think, 'Oh gosh, I've got to call so-and-so tomorrow.' And drift back down. Then they wake up at 5 a.m. and think, 'Oh God, I've got a test at 7:30 a.m., I've got to get some sleep, got to get some sleep,'" Lowenstein said.

"So the problem is that people are shifting in and out from those states so much, that even though they're spending a lot of time in bed, they're really not resting that deeply," he said.

A third factor which contributes to sleep problems is the inability to fall asleep.

Lowenstein has created a cassette to help individuals reach and stay within the deep-sleep stage. Ordinarily, most people only obtain one hour of deep-rest sleep per night.

The 30-minute tape includes deep soothing sounds that are comparable to the sound of a heart beat and deep breathing. Verbal instructions accompany the tape for the first three minutes. Just released in the last few months, the tape has special encoded harmonics that cause individuals to reach a deep sleep at a faster rate.

"The reports that we've had from around the country from people who are using this already is that they are going to sleep much more rapidly. They're sleeping much more deeply. And the outcome is that they're getting by on less time in bed. In other words, they're really not lying there and trying to sleep as much as they're really resting and sleeping," Lowenstein said.

Unlike other methods, Lowenstein's cassette guarantees results the first time used. Individuals need not learn a skill or train themselves, he said. The tape does all the work.

There are many signs to determine if an individual is not obtaining deep sleep. These include difficulty in falling sleep, waking up throughout the night and early morning, waking up very tired and having difficult dreams through the night.

Lowenstein recommends that people avoid eating two hours before bedtime so the body does not have to work at digestion. He also suggests avoiding strenuous exercise immediately before going to bed.

"Just like the old saying, 'How'd you sleep?' 'Oh, I slept like a log, feels great!' That's what we're trying to have, not just during your annual vacation or when you're home (from college) on breaks or once in a great while, but having that kind of rest most of the time," he said.

While a person sleeps, the body goes through certain biochemical changes that occur only during sleep. These changes are essential for the body to continue functioning. It is for this reason that when students pull all-nighters, they are damaging their bodies, Lowenstein said.

"Part of the thing that damages our bodies is our own trauma when we become overly excited or really anxious.

"And that's particularly true with some students who get poor grades. Part of it, of course, is because they don't put in time and study. But one of the big problems is because of the stress and the pressure. They get so uptight, so anxious," he said.

"If you want to see anxiety, go in Cardwell Hall 101, stand at the bottom of the steps and watch one of those large classes of engineers and others before and during an exam. You'll see more foot-wriggling and tension and juggling papers. What it does is block their memories, literally," he said.

Lowenstein's Conscious Living Foundation has provided information and help to 8,000 people in the United States and 14 foreign countries. Located in Manhattan for the past five years, Lowenstein plans to relocate within the next year to Oregon.

BANK SHOTS, TRICK SHOTS AND OTHER TABLE MANNERS.

I'm gonna teach you a couple things that I'll win some friends, and I'll make some money.

All you need is good eyesight, a little dexterity, and three essential items: a pool table, pool cue, and some Lite Beer from Miller.

Here's a goodie. I call it the "Cheap Shot." Place a ball on the edge of the corner pocket. Then take a half-dollar and lean it against the side rail at the other end of the table. (If you don't have a half-dollar, you can always write home to your parents; they'll love to hear from you.)

Tell your friends you're gonna sink the ball in the corner, using the half-dollar as a cue ball. It's not hard. Hit the coin solidly on the edge, just above the center, and it will roll along the rail knocking the ball in the pocket. But don't forget to scoot up the half-dollar. Because you're not supposed to lose money doing tricks.

THE CORNER TRICK
This one drives people nuts. Place a ball on the head spot. With the cue make a circle around it, approximately 8" in diameter. Then put a quarter of half-dollar on top of the ball. (Yes, you can use the same one from before, or you can write home to your parents again.) Place the cue ball behind the foot line and have your friends try to knock the coin out of the pocket. Chances are, they won't be able to. This is a good time to reach for your Lite Beer and act smug.

TABLE MANNERS
Now for single table etiquette. After you've "ruined" your friends, you gotta keep 'em. So do what I call "Cleaning the Table." Simply offer to buy the next round of Lite Beer. They'll all clear the table and head for the bar (or to your room or apartment). Then once they all have Lite (just one apiece— you're not too rich, remember), tell them with Lite in hand and a smile on your face that your shots were no big deal—you were just showing 'em.

Defective door crushes 6-year-old

PAOLA — A 6-year-old boy was crushed to death by an apparently defective automatic garage door at his home in rural Miami County over the weekend, authorities said Monday.

Deputy Sheriff Doug McDougal said Gregg E. Reed, 6, was pinned under the door when he tried to race into the garage as the door was closing.

Shirley Reed, the boy's mother, discovered her son pinned face down under the door a short time later, and he was pronounced dead at the Ransom Memorial Hospital in Ottawa. An autopsy showed death resulted from asphyxiation due to compression of the chest.

McDougal said an investigation of the door showed that it did not automatically stop or reverse its motion as it should have done with an object in its path.

Church to vote on gay ministers

WICHITA — The question of ordination of homosexuals will be one of the big issues at the quadrennial convention of United Methodists this week in Baltimore, and Kansas delegates are likely to vote thumbs-down on the proposal.

The homosexual issue may "cloud everything else at the conference," said the Rev. Elsie Crickard a delegate from Hutchinson and one of 20 from Kansas — 10 clerics and 10 laypeople — who will represent the state's United Methodists at the conference, which opens Tuesday.

The delegates say they've heard from Methodists around the state on the issue. The Kansas West Conference, which covers 80 counties, voted 2-1 last year to recommend that homosexuals not be admitted to the ministry. The Kansas East Conference has made no recommendation.

"If the conference should vote in liberal ways on political, sexual and fiscal matters," said delegate Marvin McReynolds of Woodston, "I believe the local churches would feel like the leadership had deserted them."

Pizza magnate builds new home

OMAHA — Pizza magnate William M. "Willy" Theisen is building a big house in Omaha's fashionable Regency neighborhood that is already drawing sightseers.

"It's awesome, totally awesome," said city building inspector Bill Miller, who visited the house earlier this month. "It's the most impressive house I have ever seen."

Miller said it takes 45 minutes to walk through the house if you spend a little time in each room.

When completed, the $525,000 structure will be home for Theisen, his wife and two children. Theisen, 38, founded the Godfather's Pizza restaurant chain and is now vice chairman of Diversifoods Inc., a new company that includes Godfather's.

Democrats discuss illegal immigration

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Presidential candidates courting votes in border areas of Texas and California are being confronted with a potent election-year issue — efforts in Congress to curb illegal immigration.

All three Democrats running for the nomination staunchly oppose the core of the administration-backed measure — sanctions against employers who hire illegal aliens — but from there, positions and solutions vary.

In his attempt to bring Hispanics into his "rainbow coalition," the Rev. Jesse Jackson has called for a blanket amnesty for all illegals in the country.

Sen. Gary Hart has emphasized an international approach to curbing the flow of illegals. Walter Mondale, campaigning in Beaumont, Texas, said he favored "stronger enforcement at the border, beefing up the border patrol and the immigration service." He supports a bill put forward by Hispanic members of Congress which rejects sanctions and strengthens border patrols.

Campaigning over the weekend, Hart told Mexican-American voters in El Paso the "real solution for the immigration problem will not occur until the Mexican economy turns back up." He called for "a much more creative bilateral economic policy for development of the Mexican economy."

Hart said "the bitter in that (immigration) legislation outweighs the sweet," contending the sanctions "discriminate very strongly and harshly against Mexican-Americans."

Also in El Paso last week, Mondale criticized employer sanctions as "a very bad idea" and said "employers who would be subject to criminal penalties would be very reluctant to hire people with accents, Hispanics or others, for fear of getting into trouble."

Mondale said that he backed "some form of amnesty," but that he feared the proposed legislation would lead to some form of identity card.

The alternative would also provide more resources to enforce existing labor laws, with the idea that employers hire illegal aliens because they can be exploited.

The legislation — the first overhaul of U.S. immigration law in three decades — is of particular interest to the nation's 16 million Hispanic citizens. They are the country's largest growing minority and a voting bloc of key importance to the Reagan administration and to Democrats desirous of holding onto a traditional ally.

The overwhelming majority of illegals are believed to be Hispanics. Estimates vary, and no one knows for sure how many are in the country, but illegals are believed to number anywhere from 3 million to 13 million.

A recent Census Bureau report estimates that the legal U.S. Hispanic population numbers nearly 16 million, and that over 50 percent reside in California and Texas, with sizeable concentrations in New York, Florida and Illinois. In the fall, those states will provide more than half the electoral votes needed to elect a president.

Rep. Martin Frost, D-Texas, says "there is a lot of concern" in his states over the immigration bill. Frost is a member of the House Rules Committee, which is considering how the legislation will be handled when it is expected to reach the floor in May.

Hispanic lobbying organizations fear its penalties might encourage employers to discriminate against Hispanics, even if they are legal citizens, and that some provisions of the bill calling for worker certification could lead to a national identity card.

Backers argue that because the legislation provides an amnesty for millions of illegal aliens already in the country, it will give them legal status and free them from exploitation. Other supporters contend that Americans are losing jobs to the illegals and that if employers are discouraged from hiring them, the magnet to cross the border for jobs will be removed.

"Definitely, we are trying to make this an issue," said Joe Trevino, director of legislation for LULAC, the League of United Latin American Citizens. "If any candidate wants to curry favor with Hispanics, they will have to address it."

Willy Velasquez, head of an intensive Hispanic voter education and registration project in Texas, pointed out that both parties could glean Hispanic votes on the issue "because even though on many issues we are one, on this we are divided."

Some elements of the Hispanic community want to see the flood of immigrants stopped, Velasquez said in a telephone interview from San Antonio.

"Unemployment and the prospect of unemployment overshadows everything else," he said of Hispanic voters. According to polls his group has taken, about 60 percent of the Hispanic voters in Texas favored sanctions while about 40 percent opposed them.

Jackson has called for a "just immigration policy" and a blanket amnesty for all Hispanics already here, arguing that "they must be relieved of any fear of retribution or exploitation."

"This is not South Africa," he told a group in a Puerto Rican section of Cleveland last month. "No one should carry a passbook in his pocket." Jackson says that "people who come here in search of jobs must be respected. Undocumented workers work. They must get paid and protected for their work."

The Hispanic members' alternative legislation would provide more resources to enforce existing labor laws, with the idea that employers hire illegal aliens because they can be exploited.

Hart has argued that immigration legislation has focused entirely on domestic issues and does not address it as "a matter of foreign policy...even the strictest enforcement would have little long-term effect."

Immigration bills were sponsored in the House and Senate by Sen. Alan K. Simpson, R-Wyo., and Rep. Romano Mazzoli, D-Ky. The Senate passed its version last summer.

Preachers stir officials at Virginia university

By The College Press Service

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — University of Virginia administrators, hoping to tone down the disruptions caused by traveling evangelists who preach in the middle of campus, are making changes to try to keep the noise down.

Under a new interpretation of an old rule adopted by the University Scheduling Committee, on-campus preachers and other speakers can speak now only on a certain part of the lawn, the large park-like area in the middle of the campus.

In 1981, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled Princeton, a private university, had the right to keep certain non-university people off its campus. But the University of Virginia is a public school.

At least some of the people affected by the new rule, however, don't seem to mind it.

"I don't believe in absolute free speech," said Mark Beliles, director of Maranatha Ministries in Charlottesville.

In late February, a student preacher associated with the Maranatha group refused to comply with a professor's request to lower his voice because he was disturbing people in the surrounding classrooms and offices.

Though the new segregation rule was a reaction to the overall situation, according to Professor Charles Tolbert of the University Scheduling Committee, the Maranatha confrontation was "the precipitating incident."

"A number of professors near that spot were disturbed in their offices," Beliles said. "They couldn't concentrate, couldn't counsel with students or do research. We understand. We didn't want that to happen."

But many of the best-known and most disruptive of the traveling evangelists — preachers like Brother Jed Smok who often try to make their points by provoking students with accusations of being "sluts" and "devils" — are not associated with any campus groups.

"Traveling preachers are usually either self-sustaining or they take love offerings at the time they speak," said Warren Dean, a University of Southern Mississippi administrator and spokesman for the Association for the Coordination of University Religious Affairs. "A religious group or student government can bring the preacher in under a contract agreement, but the contract arrangement is rare."

If a student group sponsors a speaker who sermonizes on the wrong part of campus, the group itself may be subject to disciplinary action.

Tolbert said he disagrees that the regulation may limit preachers' rights to free speech, pointing out the evangelists are free to speak elsewhere on the campus.

Local agency appeals to city for foster parent volunteers

By LEE WHITE
Manhattan Editor

Officials of a child welfare agency that has served Manhattan for six years, but has had an office here for only three months, have appealed for foster families to house children in three temporary care programs.

The Kansas Children's Service League, a statewide, private, non-profit agency, has only one licensed foster family with which to place children in its respite, temporary and emergency care programs, said Kim Menard, a social worker in the Manhattan office.

KCSL, an agency which was established in 1893 and receives some of its funding from the United Way, also provides pregnancy counseling and adoption planning and placement services. Clients pay according to their abilities.

Of primary concern now, however, are the foster care programs, Menard said.

Respite care is for mildly to severely handicapped children and is designed to provide parents a break from the strain of rearing the youngsters, she said. Children's stays in foster homes are planned to ensure understanding of special needs, and families are compensated $13 a day per child.

Temporary care is similar to respite care, but children in this program are not handicapped, abused or neglected, Menard said. Foster families are paid $8 a day per child for participation in this program.

"Most of the time, it's a sick parent who can't care for the children," she said. "The length of stay depends on the crisis."

Emergency foster care is for abused, abandoned or neglected children who often have behavior problems, Menard said. The agency has a contract with the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services to provide 90 days of care for these children until the state can make more permanent arrangements.

Couples are paid $9.35 a day per child for participation in the emergency care program, she said.

In order to become a foster family, a couple must be between the ages of 18 and 65 and pass licensing requirements, she said.

As part of the licensing procedure, Menard said, she obtains three references on the couple and inspects the home for unsafe conditions using a list provided by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment. Then, she interviews the couple to determine attitudes toward having foster children.

"I've never had a foster parent quit because of burnout," she said. "But this area is so mobile that people are moving right and left."

Assisting Menard this semester is Kyle Heath, senior in social work, who is completing 32 hours a week of field practicum in the local office.

"Every program we do have isn't duplicated in the community," Heath said. "I think field practicum is the most important part of your education. I feel good every day — like I've helped somebody."

The only program Heath doesn't help with is pregnancy counseling, which requires a licensed social worker.

"You can get attached to clients real easily," she said. "Terminating my clients is hard. I don't get to follow through and see what happens to them."

Those interested in becoming foster families may contact Menard at 539-3193. Her office, 227 Southwind Place, is open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. weekdays.

Commissioners to elect mayor, pro-tem at city meeting tonight

Manhattan will get a new mayor tonight.

At the Manhattan City Commission meeting at 7 p.m. today at City Hall, commissioners will choose a new mayor and mayor pro-tem to replace Wanda Fateley and Dave Fiser who, respectively, held the largely ceremonial jobs the past year.

If the commission does as it has in the past, Fiser will become mayor and Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood will become mayor pro-tem. This means Lindamood, an outspoken critic of downtown redevelopment, could be mayor when ground is broken for the proposed downtown mall.

The new mayor and mayor pro-tem are to hold office until the second meeting in April 1985.

In other business, the commission is to consider whether to authorize the new mayor and City Clerk Gregg Gibson to execute a supplemental agreement with Forest City Rental Properties and JCP Realty Inc. for downtown redevelopment. The renegotiated agreement has fewer loopholes that would allow the 50-50 partners in redevelopment to pull out of the project.

The commission also is to consider authorizing the mayor to execute an agreement to bring the city closer to receiving a $10 million Urban Development Action Grant to fund redevelopment.

An ordinance that would prohibit parking in front of multiple-family buildings and would require landscaping in front of residential buildings is to receive second reading. Commissioners also are to consider first reading of an ordinance authorizing an increase in the maximum mill levy for support of the Manhattan Public Library from five to six mills to allow additional hours of operation.

Residents of the 1800 block of Fairchild Avenue have requested that a parking permit system be established for the western end of the block. Commissioners may consider first reading of an ordinance to create such a system.

In final action, the commission is to consider whether to conduct a closed-door session at 4 p.m. Wednesday at City Hall to discuss employee negotiations and acquisition of property.

K-State rolls past Tigers in opener

By HUEY COUNTS
Sports Editor

K-State batters were practically unstoppable in the opening game of their double-header against the University of Missouri on Monday, pounding out 18 hits — six for extra bases — as they rolled past the Tigers, 16-8, at Frank Myers Field.

The second game was a different story for the Wildcat hitters. Missouri won the game 6-1, and the 'Cats could manage only three hits off Tiger starting pitcher Tim Danze.

In the opener the Wildcats trailed 3-2 before scoring three runs in the bottom of the fourth inning. David Banning led off the inning with a single. Jay Kvasnicka laid a bunt down the first base line that the Tigers misplayed, allowing Banning to advance to third and Kvasnicka to reach second. Banning later scored on a wild pitch.

Two outs later, Steve Goodwin doubled home Kvasnicka and Mark

Goodwin singled home Steve Goodwin.

Brad Bollinger provided a two-run double in the top of the fifth to help Missouri regain the lead, 6-5.

But the 'Cats exploded for four runs each in the fifth and sixth innings to put the game away.

Banning, Kvasnicka and Steve Goodwin had three hits each for K-State, and every Wildcat who started had at least one hit. One of Banning's hits was a home run in the sixth inning. Brian Bascue contributed five RBIs to the winning cause.

Pitcher Scott Lichtyler was the beneficiary of the K-State offensive attack, picking up his third victory of the season. Gerry Zimmerman picked up the save with four innings of relief work.

"Lichtyler gave us five good innings," K-State Coach Bill Hickey said. "It was one of those games where it looked like whoever got the last bat was going to win the game."

"Our kids hit the ball well," he said. "We were able to keep the ball in play and put a little pressure on them."

The Tigers had 13 hits, but hurt themselves by committing seven errors.

"It's hard (to get ready to play) after having been in a motel room. They get lackadaisical and lose their edge," Hickey said in reference to the Tiger miscues.

The second game was scoreless until Missouri batted in the top of the fifth inning. The Tigers sent nine men to the plate and belted out five hits to score five runs. Russ Perkins cracked a three-run homer in the inning.

K-State's lone run came in the seventh inning. Bascue hit a two-out double and scored on Steve Goodwin's single.

Tim McKinnis, 1-1, suffered the defeat for K-State. MU's Danze improved his record to 3-1.

K-State's Big Eight Conference record is now 3-17 and 13-23 overall. Missouri is now 24-15 overall.

Baseball statistics basis for game

By DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian Reporter

Before he became the announcer at Wildcat basketball games, Dev Nelson was the radio voice of K-State athletics for 30 years. During his three decades of covering the 'Cats, Nelson did much statistical work in preparation for his broadcasts, and one source he used in compiling his statistics was The Sporting News magazine.

Through all of those years, there was something about The Sporting News that bothered Nelson — an advertisement for a board game which ran in the classified section in the back of every issue.

"I kept seeing that dumb ad concerning a table-type baseball game," he said. "Ridiculous, I thought. Why would someone waste their valuable time on something like that? But every week I kept seeing the ad. Finally, I gave up and sent for the darn thing."

The game is called APBA and was created by Dick Seitz just before he began serving in the armed forces. Nelson interviewed Seitz for a talk show program a couple of years ago, and Seitz related how the table-top game originated.

"By the time I was ready to go into the Army, I took a typewritten copy of the game that I had developed and had it condensed into a booklet form," Seitz said. "After I finished basic training, I introduced it into the barracks, and I was really surprised to see how popular it was. We even drew spectators who stood around and watched."

"These little incidents made me believe that this thing could be sold one day, but I put it off. The year the (Philadelphia) Phillies won the pennant, 1950, I decided to update the game so my wife and I could play it. "I decided to see what kind of money it would run into to get it printed. To pay for it, I would sell the other copies I had. I had 150 copies printed, advertised in The Sporting News and sold out and could have used more. As a consequence, I lost $200 that year."

"In 1952, the second year, I made money, and I made money thereafter," Seitz said. "In 1958 I bought out the football game, and subsequently golf, basketball, horse racing and bowling. All the games are based on the same principle of reproducing real-life records or averages."

The baseball version of the game has taken off in the 33 years since its inception, and K-State and the city of Manhattan have been affected by the boom. Manhattan now has an APBA baseball league, consisting of 10 area businessmen and K-State administrators and faculty members.

Each new season opens after the managers decide what season or format the league will adopt. The game currently being played involves players who played in the American League during 1983. The game is played with cards which contain probabilities in numerical form.

For example, a hitter card contains probabilities on everything from stolen bases to home runs. Each player, according to Nelson, is rated on a 30-point scale, with 30 being the highest. Relief pitcher Dan Quisenberry of the Kansas City Royals, for example, has a rating of 18, the highest rating for a relief man.

Because each player is graded in terms of his actual ability, the procedure by which each manager in the Manhattan league drafts players is important to how well a team does during the year, said Bill Felber, commissioner of the league and one of its founders three years ago.

After the draft has taken place, the members of the league determine the length of the schedule. This year's schedule includes 162 games — the same number played at the major league level, Felber said.

The players meet at a designated place every other week for an eight or nine month period and face each other in one three-game series. Nelson, for example, opened his season by facing Janssen and lost two of the three games. Quisenberry, who was drafted by Janssen, notched a save in one of the wins.

Injuries and other circumstances also can occur, making the game even more realistic, Felber said.

Both Felber and Nelson said that due to the involved nature of the game, a player must be a true baseball fan to have a good understanding of its strategies and procedures.

Most of the members of the league consider the game to be a hobby. Felber and Nelson agreed, and both said they believe that because of this factor, and the fact that baseball board games are becoming more popular across the country, APBA baseball will be a game long played by fans.

"I'll be involved in baseball, and the game, until my dream comes true — when the Chicago Cubs win the pennant. The hell with coaching, baseball history and playing board games. I just won't care. I just want to live long enough to see it happen."

It may happen faster if Felber plays it on the board in Manhattan.

Kuhn upset over decision in Perez case

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn, claiming an arbitrator's decision undercuts his power to deal with players' drug problems, said Monday he will try to take further action in the case of Atlanta Braves pitcher Pascual Perez.

Kuhn suspended Perez without pay for one month, until May 16, after the player was convicted of cocaine possession in the Dominican Republic. On Saturday, that suspension was lifted by arbitrator Richard

I. Bloch after Perez took the case to grievance.

Kuhn said his office might now have to reconsider its approach to handling drug problems. "We'll just have to sit back and see what we can do," Kuhn said in a telephone interview.

Want To Sell Your Books ?

Question: How does the Union Bookstore determine how much your books are worth when you sell them back?

Answer: If the Bookstore has notification from the instructor that the books are to be re-adopted for use the next semester, and if the Bookstore does not already have a sufficient stock on hand, then you will be offered 60% of the publisher's current list price.

For example: If a book sells for $10 new and it meets the requirements noted above, the book would be bought from you for $6.

If the Bookstore has not received notice that the book will be used again, or if it already has a sufficient stock on hand, the book would be worth the current wholesale price as indicated by one of the nation's largest jobbers of used textbooks.

If you have any questions about the price being paid for a textbook, the buyer will be happy to answer any questions which you may have regarding the price paid.

Question: Is 60% the usual price paid for textbooks around the country?

Answer: Definitely not. Most stores in the United States pay only 50% for books being used again. The Union Bookstore is one of the few stores which pays 60%. And remember, we pay cash. You don't have to take your money out in trade.

Question: What about paperbacks? Does the 60% policy apply to them too?

Answer: Yes. The Union Bookstore does not penalize you on paperbacks. If they are being used again, and if the bookstore needs them, you will receive 60% of the publisher's list price.

Question: If the publisher's price has gone up since I bought my books, will I receive the benefit of that price increase?

Answer: Yes. For instance, if you bought your book for $9 and the publisher's list price is now $10, you will get $6, not $5.40.

Students help students better understand University life

U-LearN expands with walk-up window, paraprofessionals

By ALISON LANG
Contributing Writer

The phone has interrupted her studying four times in the last 30 minutes, but Natalie Darfler, freshman in computer science, doesn't mind.

She knows she's got the information she needs.

Behind her, a floor-to-ceiling bulletin board is covered with a copy of a television listings magazine, lists of zip codes and tutors, and the Kansas City Symphony schedule.

A large poster listing campus telephone numbers and a bulletin board with clippings from the week's issues of the Collegian cover the wall in front of her. There is a sign taped across the face of the clock: "Does anybody REALLY know what time it is?"

The phone rings again, and she looks up from her lecture notes to answer it.

"U-LearN, this is Natalie. May I help you?"

Each day, an average of 250 phone calls are answered in the phone room at U-LearN, the University Learning Enhancement and Resource Network, located in the basement of Holton Hall.

When a person calls U-LearN, one of 28 "information specialists" will answer, or try to answer, any question. These "information specialists" are students who, like Darfler, donate their time and have been trained in how to use U-LearN's resource room and how to find information in Farrell Library.

By dialing 532-6442 (between 8 a.m. and 10 p.m. weekdays and from noon to 6 p.m. weekends), a person can ask "literally anything under the sun," said associate coordinator Laurie Fairburn, senior in journalism and mass communications.

"We can tell you where to get a lost I.D. replaced, what makes toothpaste sweet or the population of Berlin," a leaflet about U-LearN states.

But U-LearN is more than just a phone number, Fairburn said, starting this year. Formerly ULN, University Learning Network, the addition of a walk-up window, a resource room, a helping center and 12 paraprofessionals make U-LearN "a lot more than just general information," Fairburn said.

The paraprofessionals are students who take a three-credit hour course called Interaction and Guidance for the Paraprofessional. Learning communications and helping skills and career exploration techniques, the "P.P.'s" apply what they learn in class by spending at least two hours a week working at U-LearN.

The course also covers self-exploration, which has helped P.P. Debbie Paap, freshman in pre-art therapy, in her dealings with the students in the resource center.

"If you learn more about yourself, you can understand them better and what they're going through," Paap said. "It's empathy."

The P.P.'s help students in four major areas of interest: career exploration, study skills, sexuality and health education. Among the sources of information available is Kansas Careers, a program that links a student's goals and abilities with career suggestions. U-LearN lists tutors and individualized programs to improve study habits, plus information about stress management, alcoholism and other issues related to health.

Associate coordinator Laura McCauley, graduate student in social work, and Fairburn agree that a big misconception of U-LearN is that it is a big room with a lot of computers and telephones.

"There are no computers. Our main resources are books, along with the willingness to look for the information," Fairburn said. "All U-LearN is and what makes it so interesting and so much fun for the volunteers is that they're here to help people by using their own common sense and ingenuity."

One of the rewards of working with other students in the helping center is learning how to communicate with others and how to be more open, Julie Stephens, freshman in psychology, said.

"I like it when I know I'm helping someone," Darfler said, adding that she enjoyed some of the "wacky" questions she hears. ("Is St. Louis a state?" and "How much does a cubic yard of sand weigh?" are examples.)

Fairburn's goal for the upcoming year is "to concentrate on hitting the pavement hard and telling people what U-LearN is all about."

U-LearN is a service run by the students, for the students, McCauley and Fairburn said.

"We provide not only information, we provide understanding and concern. We put out the message, 'We care. We know what it's like,'" McCauley said. "And that is what's important."

'Consumer Reports' wins libel suit

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court, in a decision that could save news organizations millions of dollars annually, ruled Monday that appeals courts have broad power to second-guess trial courts in libel cases.

The 6-3 ruling, greeted with a sigh of relief by news media representatives, killed a $210,905 award to a stereo loudspeaker manufacturer that had sued Consumer Reports magazine.

"The requirement of independent appellate review... reflects a deeply held conviction that judges — and particularly members of this court — must exercise such review in order to preserve the precious liberties established and ordained by the Constitution," Justice John Paul Stevens wrote for the court.

Bruce Sanford, a Washington lawyer for the Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi, praised Monday's ruling.

"The Supreme Court has affirmed resoundingly the critical need for cool, dispassionate appellate scrutiny of jury verdicts against the press," he said. "In an era of punishing libel mega-verdicts, the decision will have practical and salutary benefits."

The case decided Monday arose when Consumer Reports, a monthly magazine published by the Consumers Union of the United States, evaluated 24 loudspeakers in a May 1970 article. The report said that sounds from a Bose Corp. speaker "tended to wander about the room."

Cuts in funding focus attention on expenses

(Editor's note: This is the first of two articles about recent changes in the K-State shuttle service for permanently and temporarily handicapped students.)

By LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

Temporarily handicapped students using K-State's shuttle service will be required to pay $1 a day next year.

A task force studying shuttle service recommended a user fee of $1 a day, not to exceed $40 a semester, to replace part of the funding which had come from student fees. According to a task force report, money from the fee will total about $800 a year. Permanently handicapped students using the shuttle service will not be required to pay a fee.

The shuttle began as a service for permanently physically disabled students. The van that transports these students was purchased with money from student fees, said Lori Leu, task force chairman and senior in social sciences.

The van was used to transport the permanently handicapped students because the campus is inaccessible, said Gretchen Holden, coordinator of services for physically limited students.

"The shuttle service is critical because this campus is not accessible," she said. "For example, a student in a wheelchair cannot travel from the accessible dorm, Moore Hall, to the core of the campus without traveling in the street. They are not safe if they are not in the van."

Temporarily handicapped students to pay shuttle charges

However, the van had extra room when carrying only permanently handicapped students.

"The van was not full, so it seemed perfectly reasonable to put on temporaries (temporarily handicapped students)," Holden said.

Transportation demand from temporarily handicapped students soon exceeded availability.

"It grew and grew and grew, to the point where we have more students for any one class hour than we can get to class," Holden said. "There is no way you can get 10 people to class (at the same hour) on this campus." The van can carry six students.

In an attempt to meet this demand, Students for Handicapped Concerns requested that Student Governing Association provide funds from student fees. This money was to go for rental of an extra car and salary for a student driver. Upkeep on the van and the driver's salary would still be paid by the University.

In fall 1982, SGA, through Student Senate, provided funding for the shuttle service. Keeping this funding has not been easy, Holden said.

"Every year the (senate) Finance Committee has recommended against funding this service," she said. "They say this (the shuttle) is the University's responsibility."

But the responsibility for the transporting the temporarily handicapped lies with the students, Holden said.

"This is a student service. It gets them to classes — it doesn't get them to the parachute club or to Topeka to lobby the legislators," she said.

The Finance Committee recommendations prompted senate to request a task force be established to study funding alternatives for the operation of the shuttle service for the temporarily handicapped, Leu said. The task force was established in fall 1983.

The task force considered two funding options, funding from other groups and a user fee system.

"We were looking for the ideal service, something to expand toward," Leu said.

A telephone survey of students who had used the service was conducted by the task force. The survey included questions about the type of physical limitation, how long the student used the service and whether the student lived on or off campus, Leu said.

According to the report, the handicaps were primarily injuries to the legs or hips, and the average time the student used the service was two to three weeks. The majority of students contacted lived within three blocks of campus, Leu said.

"I don't know if that's because everyone hurt lives there (within two or three blocks) or if they're the only ones who can get to campus when they're hurt," she said. The shuttle service does not run off campus.

A user fee was supported by the majority of those questioned. The report showed 84 percent of students

Acker to resolve health policy issue

A decision will be made today by K-State President Duane Acker whether to accept Student Senate's recommendation of the student health insurance offered by Keystone Insurance.

Under the plan, maternity benefits would not automatically be included in general coverage, but would have to be purchased as a rider for $400. The coverage provided would not exceed $1,000, said Dianne Urban, students' attorney.

This optional maternity coverage on the health insurance plan would not be adequate for a woman planning to become pregnant, said Dr. Robert Tout, director of student health at Lafene Student Health Center.

"A lot of women may be under the impression the $400 extra (for the maternity coverage rider) or the lower premium coverage without the pregnancy clause means something. My concern is if anyone actually wanted pregnancy coverage, they certainly wouldn't want this policy because it isn't going to give them any coverage," he said.

Tout said he believes Keystone is not trying to discriminate against or cheat anyone.

"I'm not knocking Keystone, all I'm trying to say is if my daughter were planning to get pregnant, I would certainly advise her to look into other maternity coverage," he said.

If Acker supports senate's recommendation, Tout said he would advise policyholders to check to see exactly what is covered and whether they believe their maternity insurance is adequate.

He said many policyholders may not be aware of the extent of their maternity coverage.

Urban said maternity benefits would include coverage for abortions if maternity coverage is included in the total insurance package.

If the optional maternity rider plan is approved, abortion also will be covered under this package, Urban said. She said the only instance of abortions not being covered by student health insurance is if the optional rider plan is chosen and a student does not purchase the rider.

Tout said he is concerned that whatever adds cost to premiums results in fewer people taking out a policy.

He said couples should examine different health plans due to their special. Tout said he would urge students to read insurance policies carefully and be aware of all coverage included.

Regents rule requires new faculty contracts

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

A policy requiring K-State unclassified employees with continuing appointments to sign new contracts for the 1984-1985 school year has many faculty members confused and disturbed.

In the past, faculty members signed initial contracts, and oral agreements were made each following year.

Provost Owen Koeppel said the Kansas Board of Regents has mandated that faculty at all regents institutions sign new contracts beginning with the 1984-1985 school year. The reasons given by the regents' attorney for the new policy have to do with the recent threat of budget cuts, Koeppel said.

"During the late summer of 1982, the governor asked the regents to cut the budget by 4 percent," he said. "It looked like there could be still another reduction. We were fearful that we would have to cut salaries in mid-year."

"The regents' attorney felt that those people who have signed initial contracts that year had a firmer promise from the University than those who had just been told that they would receive a $1,000 pay increase."

Another reason for the change in policy is to allow for regulation changes by the regents or the universities, he said.

"The form they (the regents) wish to have signed acknowledges that the signer fully understands the rules of the board and the university," Koeppel said. "If the faculty were only to sign an initial contract, they might claim that they never acknowledged new rules or regulations by the board or university."

Koeppel said he is dissatisfied with the policy.

"The Board of Regents mandated that this be done; it wasn't the campus's idea," he said. "If you can find anybody happy about it, please tell me. Most people wish it wasn't happening. It's a lot of work."

Koeppel said a form for the contracts has been established, but some faculty members have suggested some changes in wording. A final form was to have been decided upon at a dean's conference Monday afternoon, but copies of some material had not been received, so no final decision was made.

One concern voiced about sending out the contracts now was that the regents will not approve salaries until late June.

The University of Kansas has considered not sending out contracts until after June. Because faculty are harder to reach at that time, Koeppel said he will probably send out the present form of the contract as soon as possible and include a clause that says the salary stated is contingent upon approval by the regents at their June meeting.

"I think it's important that people realize that this contract in no way threatens their existing rights," he said. "It does not threaten those with tenure or those who feel they are on the track to tenure."

Peters to leave post to continue sculpting

After 34 years of involvement with K-State, Chet Peters, vice president for student affairs, announced Tuesday he will retire at the end of the 1984-1985 academic year, probably in May or June.

Peters said his retirement is a time for the University to enhance its opportunity to review student welfare programs and services.

"It (my retirement) gives an opportunity for some new directions and some new thought," he said.

Peters said he is ready to begin a second career.

He has done wood sculpture as a hobby for at least 20 years, and said he hopes to continue doing commissioned sculptures. Peters uses his sculptures to illustrate concepts in speeches he makes.

"I want to keep creativity alive," Peters said, adding that he wants to have a second career in wood sculpting, "but at the pace that I wish to set."

Peters said he views life as the "three 30s." One has until age 30 to complete doctorate work, 30 years to work, and, with the advances of medicine, 30 more years in which to do other things.

"The question is, what do I do with the last 30? I want to do something I can control," he said.

Peters was an assistant dean of arts and sciences and director of the K-State Placement Center before being named dean of students in 1962. In 1967 his title was changed to vice president for student affairs. He received his bachelor of science and his master of science degrees from K-State.

"Both students and faculty admire and appreciate the empathy Chet Peters has, the guidance he gives and the example he provides. That example will persist in the University beyond his retirement," K-State President Duane Acker said of Peters' decision.

Bill Miller, associate professor of architecture, takes an hour to play bocce between Seaton Court and Holtz Hall on Tuesday. Miller is one of a group of K-State professors known as the Boccie Bunch, who play the game which is similar to lawn bowling.

Boccie Bunch borrows Italian sport

By BEVERLY J. MILLER
Collegian Reporter

In the game of bocce, it's not important how or where you play, say local enthusiasts, but the creation of the "proper mystique."

"It's not a fast-paced game, especially the way we play it," Bob Burnham, associate professor of architecture, said. "We stand around, watch women go by, occasionally push an opponent while he is making a shot and then make rude comments about his ability. If we were really playing it right, we'd also drink Gallo and smoke gauloises cigarettes."

"Our's is a loose version of an unusual game played with irregular players," Richard Pohlman, visiting assistant professor in architecture, said. "But I like it because it is relaxing, doesn't require much concentration and even gives me a chance to vent a little aggression — blast the other guy out."

Another member of the impromptu bocce bunch, Bill Miller, associate professor in architecture, further explained the special appeal this lawn game has to certain people.

"It's a mindful kind of game requiring skill, finesse and some body English — it's decidedly unathletic," he said.

A recent attempt to buy a bocce (pronounced bach-ee) set indicated the game is not well-known locally. All but one retailer had never heard of it, and many wondered if it was anything like croquet or hackysack.

But travelers to Italy or just to San Francisco and other large American cities tell about seeing groups of older Italian men in spaghetti-strapped, tank-top undershirts, dress pants, sandals with socks, hats and cigarettes in their mouths, tossing balls at other balls in a sandy pitch.

"If you have ever seen the game being played," Miller said, "you'd realized that we, in our group, are violating an important code of the tradition. We are entirely too young to be playing this game — and definitely dressed all wrong."

So, to get on with it, this is how the game is played.

History relates it to such ball-tossing games as British lawn bowls, Dutch skittles, an ancient Egyptian game played with nine pieces of stone and a stone ball and the modern indoor game of bowling.

Boccie is played — by the local bocce bunch, at least — with eight colored balls about 4 to 5 inches in diameter and one much smaller, yellow target ball. Without the benefit of an enclosed pitch, any open lawn area about 20 feet by 70 feet will do. The game usually consists of four players. One player or team member throws out the yellow ball. It's then the opponent's turn to toss, underhanded, the first colored ball.

"The object of the game is to get your ball(s) as close as possible to the yellow ball," Burnham said. "Or if you can knock your opponent's ball away, that's part of it, too. After the eight balls are thrown, the ball closest to the target gets one point; if you have two balls closer than your opponent, you get two points. You play to 21 points."

Parachutists break altitude record

Four members of the K-State Skydiving Club broke the high altitude record for northeast Kansas on Monday.

The former record for this drop zone was 12,500 feet. The successful jump Monday was at 14,000 feet.

Sgt. Joe Giampietro of the 1st Medical Battalion at Fort Riley, Ed Goff, sophomore in electrical engineering; Doug Schmidt, graduate in entomology; and Mark Young, graduate in chemistry, broke the record at the Wamego Airport using the club's Cessna 182 aircraft.

The temperature at 14,000 feet was 4 degrees and the total free-fall time on the jump was about 90 seconds.

The world record is 102,000 feet. The record for the state of Kansas is about 23,000 feet. On-board oxygen is required for all jumps above 15,000 feet.

The skydiving club will attempt to break the Kansas record this summer.

Grants to support mouse research

K-State research on genetics and embryonic development in mice will be supported over the next five years by grants of $517,777 from the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development.

The project title is "Genetics and Biochemistry of Mouse Development." The award is a five-year renewal of the project, which currently is in its third year.

Principal investigator for the research is Vernon Bode, professor of biology.

His research team includes Ruth Williams, medical technician; Monica Justice and James McDonald, both graduates in biology; Mary Stech and Ellen Lowery, both seniors in pre-veterinary medicine; Dean Becker, senior in animal science and industry; and Charles Casper III, senior in chemistry.

Biology students receive awards

Three students majoring in fisheries and wildlife biology received scholarships at the annual banquet of the K-State student chapter of the Wildlife Society.

Steven Travers, junior in fisheries and wildlife biology, received the $300 Saline County Rod and Gun Club scholarship. Travers plans to do graduate work following graduation with research in the area of big game.

Dee Storey, junior in fisheries and wildlife biology, received the $400 Tri-County Rod and Gun Club of Bonner Springs conservation scholarship. Storey hopes to become a range conservationist and will work with the Soil Conservation Service this summer.

Barbara Kell, senior in fisheries and wildlife biology, received the $400 Tri-County Rod and Gun Club of Bonner Springs Past Presidents' Scholarship honoring the late Spencer Linderman, the club's first scholarship recipient. Kell plans to pursue a conservation career in the area of environmental law and has been accepted by the University of Washington Law School in Seattle.

City's original HUD document valid

City commission elects Fiser as mayor

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

A new mayor and mayor pro-tem were named by the Manhattan City Commission on Tuesday night as former Mayor Wanda Fateley ended her yearlong term in the largely ceremonial position.

Elected unanimously as mayor was former mayor pro-tem, Commissioner Dave Fiser. Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood was elected unanimously as mayor pro-tem.

Fiser congratulated Fateley on a job well done and noted the completion of the downtown mall and the new fire station as events Manhattan residents can look forward to with optimism.

The new mayor and City Clerk Gregg Gibson were authorized to execute a supplemental agreement with the partnership of Forest City Rental Properties and JCP Realty for downtown redevelopment.

Community Development Director Gary Stith said developers agreed to the contract, and the signed document is in the mail.

Lindamood, the only commissioner to vote against the proposal, cited a number of sections in the contract which she said aren't consistent with the city's practices. One of those inconsistencies deals with the use of the mall parking lot.

A section in the contract states that the developer and the city must agree to parking regulations for the mall lot. Lindamood said this would relinquish the city's control of the parking lot.

"Who else makes decisions on our city lots?" Lindamood asked. "Who owns the lot?"

Both Stith and City Attorney Bill Frost said the city owns the lot.

"So if the city owns the lot, certainly we're sharing as part owner," Lindamood said. "It's definitely a change I think we should look into."

Lindamood said that if the city shares control with this decision, maybe it should look into helping other developers with parking lots and start a precedent by sharing ownership with them.

"I really don't think we should be getting into that area," she said.

Commissioners also voted to have the mayor execute an agreement for a $10 million Urban Development Action Grant with the Department of Housing and Urban Development to help finance redevelopment.

Stith said that what was thought to be a $700,000 error on the city's part was an oversight by HUD attorneys and the city's original document is valid. The error concerned use of the UDAG to pay interest on temporary financing for the project. He said the attorneys decided UDAG funds could be used for that purpose.

Stith said HUD has signed the contract, but there are a few minor errors to be amended, such as changing the document to reflect the withdrawal of the Jones Store Co. and the addition of a Dillard's store.

Lindamood also voted against this measure, saying that all the documentation to the agreement hasn't been seen by the commissioners and that there are errors, mostly in the wording of the contract.

"I think we should wait until everything has been seen," Lindamood said. "I think we should sign a clean document, one that is correct."

After voting on the measure, Lindamood asked that it be noted in the minutes that the reason she voted against the measure was because not all of the contract has been seen and "that we know there are known errors in the document."

In another action, The Manhattan Mercury was designated as the official newspaper of the city to carry legal notices of commission activities.

Contracts

torney, said he does not see the necessity for signing new contracts at this time, but he said he can see some potential benefits.

"I think that if we were to have another threat of funding cuts, with each faculty member having a contractual obligation from the state, it might put us in a little stronger position to retain funding for faculty salaries," he said.

Dorothy Thompson, director of Affirmative Action at K-State, said she doesn't see any problems with the new contracts.

"I feel secure in the fact that no one's status as a faculty or staff member will be altered by the yearly re-affirmation of the contract," she said. "We haven't changed the form of the contract significantly, it's more a letter of appointment or a notice of continued appointment."

"It might be helpful to faculty members to have a more formal statement of their relationship with the University," Thompson said.

U-LearN Line

Every day at U-LearN, volunteers answer a lot of questions they categorize as "Fun Facts to Know and Tell." They won't help you pass a test, cure cellulite or look good on your resume, but somehow discovering these little mysteries in life makes one feel a little richer in knowledge.

Who decides exactly what time it is?

The Bureau of International de l'Heure (BIH) in Paris is the agreed timekeeper for the entire technological world. The BIH is in constant contact with laboratories and observatories in 70 countries which all contribute to the official "correct time." The clocks used at the BIH and national organizations such as our National Bureau of Standards, are correct to within a few billionths of a second. The standard time they all keep is called Coordated Universal Time.

A silver-colored alkali metal, cesium, is the element responsible for accuracy. The cesium clock is a machine that produces a tone of exact pitch and frequency. The BIH and its members have decided that 9,192,631,779 photon pulses (which produce the tone) is a good length of time for a second, so that's what it is. The cesium atom is a more precise standard than the second in the solar system — 1/31,536,000 of the time it takes the earth to go around the sun.

Countries keep their own cesium clocks, which are set identically to portable ones brought by a team of technicians from Paris. If you ever need to know what time it is (correct to a few billionths of a second) call the National Bureau of Standards, (303)-499-7111. But make sure to allow time for the signal to reach you at the speed of light, 186,000 miles per second.

Student chef to enter national contest

By DIANE KERSTING
Collegian Reporter

On May 22, Kevin Deaver, junior in restaurant management, will be handed a "mystery box" and be expected to prepare a written menu and 12 meals from its contents — all within a few hours.

Deaver will represent K-State at the first National Restaurant Association (NRA) Student Hot Food Competition at the 65th Annual NRA Restaurant, Hotel-Motel Show. The show will be held May 19-23 at McCormick Place in Chicago.

Of the 10 schools which have been given a complimentary booth at the 1984 NRA Show, each is invited to send one contestant to represent their school. Among the schools represented will be the Culinary Institute of America (New York) and Johnson and Wells (New Jersey) — two of the "most recognized culinary schools in the nation," Deaver said.

The student competition will take place in a glass-enclosed working kitchen. On the specified day of his competition, each student will go in by 7:30 a.m. to receive a "mystery box" of unknown ingredients. One hour later they must have written a menu. Then each student must prepare a total of 12 meals — two for the judges and 10 for random viewers of the show to sample.

The winner of the national competition will win a trip to Frankfurt, West Germany, to serve as an apprentice to the U.S. Culinary Team.

After being contacted about the student competition, Charlie Partlow, restaurant management program director, approached Deaver with the opportunity to represent K-State.

"I was probably chosen because of my work experience," Deaver said. "I've been in food service for 12 years."

Deaver got his first taste of the restaurant business when he took a job as a busboy in Wichita when he was 15 years old.

Eight months later, by the time he was 16, Deaver had moved from his busboy job to dishwasher, to "pit-man," (grill cook) and finally to head cook, where he remained for two more years.

"By that time I had 'topped-out,'" Deaver said, "so I went to work at the Wichita Hilton as a sous chef (sous is a French term for 'under')."

A sous chef is second chief, the right-hand-man of the executive chef, and is often responsible for organization of the kitchen and delegating kitchen responsibilities, in addition to actually working with the food, Deaver said.

After several years of working at the Hilton, Deaver chose to start at the bottom again, this time at the Wichita Country Club. He worked up to day sous chef, under the direction of German, Certified Executive Chef Dieter Preiser.

Deaver said his idea of a good chef is one who has a "vast knowledge of food that includes everything from writing a menu and being aware of nutrition, to recognizing color schemes on a plate. But also important are human skills so that he can get his crew to perform. Like an occasional pat on the back — that's human skill. To me, praise is more motivational than a 50-cent-an-hour raise."

Eventually Deaver decided to gain more education at K-State.

"I wanted to learn kitchen and dining room and then come to school, and I think I chose right. Compared to other students, I can see things they haven't seen. I have a better perspective. Plus, if I didn't have the experience, I don't think I'd have the chance to represent the school at the hot food competition," he said.

Deaver said he specializes in entrees, particularly seafood. Two of his favorites are a good Clams Casino and Oysters Rockefeller.

Deaver goes "all out for dates I bring home, from an appetizer clear through to the dessert." In addition, he also cooks for his family when he goes home to Wichita.

A tradition begun three years ago in the Deaver household is for Kevin to cook Eggs Benedict every Christmas morning.

"Now they expect it from me," he laughed. "Sometimes it gets a little rough cooking Eggs Benedict for 20 people in a regular kitchen."

Deaver said he knows many people who think chefs have secret recipes, but he said that if he makes a recipe that turns out well, he's happy to share it with anyone.

"You've got to remember that the secret is not in the recipe, it's in the technique that you use to make that recipe," he said.

Technique can be learned, according to Deaver, as this is what many of the big culinary schools teach. Yet he stressed that a lot of technique comes from experience.

"I like the restaurant industry because of the satisfaction I get from putting out an excellent meal," Deaver said.

"Plus, (some) restaurant people are a little off the wall. I like that. It's kind of like their cheese has slid off their cracker."

While Deaver credits his being a chef for helping him out in his restaurant and management career, he said he doesn't want to be a chef for the rest of his life — a paid chef, that is.

"I'll always be a chef," he said. But he has many other plans for his future.

Deaver has been at K-State for two years and said he hopes to finish his program by next May. He then has several alternatives to decide from, including going to law school to study restaurant franchise and labor law, working toward his master's degree in hotel administration or "going back to the kitchen" to become a certified executive chef.

Ultimately, he said, he would like to work for a major food corporation as head of its restaurant industry so he could "help bring up younger people, just learning, to the core of the corporation. So many people at the higher levels aren't perceptive to the talent at the younger level," he said.

Well, at least we think so. You've probably been reading during the past months about the new Smith Scholars Program and Smith Scholarship House.

In case you haven't, Smith Scholarship House is a unique house (not a dorm, not a fraternity, but a little like both) that has been a part of K-State for 25 years. The House is run cooperatively, meaning that by pitching in with the cooking and housework for a few hours a week, you can save about $50 per month over the cost of university housing.

But that's not the best part. The Smith Scholars (as those who live in Smith are called) participate in all kinds of social, cultural, athletic, leadership, and other activities not found in other living groups.

Spaces are filling up fast, but a few are still open for men who want to be part of something unique and who have GPA's of 3.0 or better.

There is much more we'd like to tell you, but there is not room here. If the Smith Scholars Program sounds like it might be right for you, you can get more information from:

Day-care cuts cater to singles

Finding money for a college education is not easy. With tuition and living costs rising ever higher, today's student is hard-pressed to make ends meet.

A recent action by both the Finance Committee and Student Senate has made it even harder for married K-State students to earn a college degree.

In addition to the usual load of classes, studying and the other responsibilities of college life, student-parents also have the extra duties of raising a child and dealing with a family situation.

For many, the Early Childhood Development Laboratory is a program on campus that provides needed assistance. Instead of being saddled with the difficult chore of finding a suitable, trustworthy baby sitter, students could leave their children at the on-campus facility under the care of trained child care specialists.

But now this ideal situation has been clouded by the senate decision to cut funding to the child care program. After 11 years of funding, senate decided the program was no longer necessary in a year with a tight activities budget.

Obviously the senate decision was not based on first hand knowledge of what the laboratory meant to K-State student-parents. It is easy for a single, childless student to call an on-campus child care facility unnecessary, but for those parents affected, the consequences are more direct.

Student-parents will find it more difficult to enroll their children into the child care program. While it will still be possible to gain admittance, the funding cut eliminates first priority in enrollment to students' children.

The laboratory is now forced to accept a wider variety of applicants into its program to keep afloat financially. In addition, daily fees for the program are to be raised from $2.75 to $3.50 per day to make up for the funds lost by the senate cut.

These circumstances will not make it easy for the K-State student-parent.

Senate should work for all K-State students. By cutting funds to the childhood laboratory, senate has defeated its purpose.

With the funding cut to the childhood laboratory, senate has rejected the concept of a campus environment that encourages all to participate. Instead, K-State is being turned into an exclusive club that caters to the childless and financially secure.

Blaming the wrong country

The United States should not pursue a policy of contempt for countries with supplies of chemical weapons. Iraq has threatened to use chemical weapons in its war against Iran, but the Reagan administration has waved its finger in disapproval.

The United States has no justification for this criticism. The Reagan administration, adamant advocate of astronomical arms buildup, should be reminded that nuclear weapons are far more deadly and have drastically more severe consequences than conventional chemical weapons.

The Reagan administration is pointing its finger in the wrong direction. The blame for escalating worldwide weapon supplies should be directed inward.

This semester is the best of all

This has been the column I've put off writing for the past three months. I've tried not to think about it too much, because I've been too busy trying to survive to worry about matters which aren't of life-threatening proportions.

But time waits for no one, so the time has come for me to write this column — the final column of my undergraduate collegiate career (although I'll have a column in this summer's Collegian).

I don't want this column to be a sappy, "thanks-for-the-memories-but-out-of-my-way-cause-I'm-graduating" piece. I have many memories of K-State I will always cherish, and I do know it's time for me to move on. It's just seems like everything is happening too quickly.

If someone would have told me three years ago I'd be writing columns for a major college newspaper my senior year, I would have asked them from which planet Scotty beamed them here. Having the K-State campus community read what you write is a challenge. Trying to keep some semblance of intelligence can drive one crazy.

I transferred to K-State from Neosho County Community College in the fall of 1981. I knew that K-State was a top university, one which takes pride in academic success. My main concern my first year here was to learn the campus and the people behind the academic traditions.

While here, I discovered the campus isn't as foreboding as I thought. I found a lot of people really care about you and want to help you in any way they can.

I hear some heads shaking out there. Well, maybe you haven't looked hard enough. I found professors willing to take time out of their hectic schedules to sit and listen to a student's concerns. I discovered many of the staff made your problems their problems.

Oh, yeah, I've encountered bureaucracy, and yeah, I have been (and still am) unhappy with a lot of the garbage a student has to fight in order to get some piddly problem solved. But for all the frustrations, I have found at least 10 times as many situations when someone was willing to say, "Let's talk about it."

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

The last two years have been great. I have lived the life of the typical college student — almost always a day late and a dollar short, but willing to try almost anything once. Sleep is the goal, but there just aren't enough hours in the day to go to class, study, do laundry, go to a game, write a paper for a class and try to grab a couple of hours of sleep along the way.

Oh, well, at least it's been fun.

If I had to pick out a semester which I would have to consider special, it would have to be this one. It isn't because it's my last one. It isn't because of the classes I've had.

It's because I've spent half of it off campus. I have spent this semester as a student teacher. I have spent this semester learning about teaching at a high school the best way possible — at a high school, teaching high school classes.

I can now be found at Chapman High School, which is about 40 miles west of here. I teach three hours of sophomore English classes and two hours of journalism classes.

I've discovered a lot about myself during my student-teaching experience. I have found I can teach English, a subject I once denounced as "barbaric" and "for sadists only." It hasn't been easy, but it has taught me English can be fun.

Journalism is, well, journalism. There are deadlines to be met for the newspaper and yearbook. The classes are busy working on stories everywhere. It's busy and hectic, just like it ought to be. And it's a lot of fun for everyone.

Student teaching is fostering, I share a ride with Brian Foster, who also is student teaching at Chapman. We leave Manhattan at 7 a.m., spend 45 minutes on the road to Chapman, teach from 8:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m., stay until usually 4:30 p.m. or so, working with students or preparing for the next day, and then take the 45-minute trip back to Manhattan.

Is the day done? No way. Papers need to be graded, stories read, lesson plans refined, altered or created. Add to this any extracurricular activities at CHS that night, and it can be a very late night (or early morning, depending upon your point of view) before one can go to bed.

Is it worth it? If you ask my bank account, it would say no. If you ask me, I'll tell you it's worth every minute, even with the hassles and occasional discipline problems and other headaches. All it takes is one student to say "Thanks" or "I understand it now" and my day is made.

The students have given me a fair shot, I believe. We've learned from each other and made mistakes along the way. I respect them for who they are, and I think they respect me for who I am.

So ends my final semester at K-State. I know once I receive my degree at commencement May 12, I cannot go back. I look forward to the challenges which lay ahead of me, but a little part of me will always be here.

Thank you for being a part of my collegiate career. Your comments and criticisms have been appreciated. If my columns have been able to make you laugh, or cry or whatever, fine. If they have made you think, I've done my job.

Peace and love to you always.

Learning to say 'I love you'

Goodbye.

There, I said it.

Nothing is easy to write. But for a journalist, that's not supposed to be true. This is the most difficult thing I've ever written, and yet I've never wanted to write anything more.

It always seems that the end of the year brings about a myriad of farewell columns. In some aspects, this one is no different. I, too, will be suffering the pangs of losing close friends to jobs, sunny surfs or dreams. The hurt I'm feeling can't be erased, nor do I want it to be. It is by measuring the degree of my pain that I realize how much these people mean to me.

Last summer, alone in a Rocky Mountain forest near Aspen, I came to an understanding with myself and my dreams. In my favorite novel, "The Last Convertible," it is written that everyone has one shining, golden year in their life. In Colorado I vowed to beat the system and make the rest of my life "golden."

I haven't perfected my own system yet, but it is the yearning and dreaming from within that fuels the fire. And yet, I can't help but feel this year may have been my shining year.

Rather than merely being content with my dreams, I began pursuing them. I've always wanted to be old enough to do all the things I've dreamt of — traveling, writing, living and loving. Everyone has a gut feeling of when they want their dreams to start. Going solo to the Rockies last summer was the rise of my dreams.

Driving across the Great Plains left me with a lot of time to think. A few days before I left, Mom and Dad had asked for an itinerary of my travels. I couldn't give them one. I wouldn't make any promises I knew I couldn't keep, for my mood was energetic and explosive. Longing for no ties or responsibilities, I took off in pursuit of something I couldn't explain.

As I traversed the high country, I pondered the 20 years I felt I'd wasted withholding emotions from close friends, and most importantly, my family. Appropriately standing atop Independence Pass, the highest pass in Colorado, I wanted to shout my feelings to my family in hope the echoes might reach them. I wanted to thank them for the freedom, the independence, and the continual love they'd given me.

LUCY REILLY
Guest Columnist

Feelings of love for each of my six older brothers and sisters overwhelmed me. Their dates were often forced to suffer through interminable evenings when an obnoxious, bratty me begged to go along.

The Brady Bunch we weren't. We fought constantly, but eventually our Irish tempers would succumb to fits of laughter and tickle fights. Occasionally hot heads would clash, and someone would come in for dinner with a new bruise. But time continued and the bonds strengthened.

I've always wanted to know my family better and for them to know me. Between my schooling and their jobs and families, it's hard to find the time. But at least I have the rest of my life to reach out to them and hope they reach back.

It always hurt when I saw an older brother sidelined on the field because of an injury, or when I shared the pain of a sister's latest broken heart. I never told them I cared, hoping my actions were proof enough. But recently I've encountered a situation where actions won't be enough.

My dad has cancer.

It's been a period of emotional instability. When I went home to see him last weekend, I felt lost. I couldn't begin to bring to the surface the emotions I uncovered in Colorado — determination, positiveness, hope and happiness. All I could think of was that the most powerful, dominant force in my life was sick. Forty pounds have evaporated since Christmas, and yet he's still fighting.

The dream of uncovering my family's real identity is being realized. The bonds have strengthened incredibly within the last two months. I heard Sean, telling Dad before we left Sunday he loved him. In 21 years, I'd never heard one of my brothers talk like that to Dad. I'm thankful it was raining when I came in after packing the car to say goodbye to Dad because at least he couldn't tell I'd been crying.

I wanted so much to be able to go to where Dad lay and take him in my arms and hold him. I couldn't. Fear of emotional vulnerability encompassed me. I knew I'd cry, but the fear of seeing tears in his eyes stopped me.

Internal conflicts mounted within me on my drive back to Manhattan. Everything I'd accomplished in Colorado, and throughout the past year at K-State, have been shot down when it came to the real test. When I go home after finals, I'd love to crawl up in his lap, as I did when I was young, and watch TV. Memories of being tickled by his 5 o'clock shadow of a beard, or playing "bumble bee," cause my eyes to well up with water. This time, I'll be the one who holds him.

Dad, if I could, I'd give you a lifetime of ocean sunrises, travels to faraway places with Mom, and a chance to start all over again so I could tell you how much I love you.

Dan Fogelberg wrote a song:

The leader of the band is tired and his eyes are growing old, but his blood runs through my instrument and his song is in my soul. My life has been a poor attempt to imitate the man, I'm just the living legacy of the leader of the band.

(Editor's note: Lucy Reilly is a junior in journalism and mass communications.)

Letters

Freedom requires accepting responsibility

Editor,

Re: Chris Silva's letter, "Auto safety bags erode freedom of choice," in the April 27 Collegian.

It appears Silva has forgotten about the flip side of freedom — responsibility. Freedom is a wonderful thing, but without responsibility, freedom is just an excuse to live off of other members of society who accept the results of abused freedom.

Does Silva realize that 88 percent of the people who ride in automobiles do not use seatbelts? Seatbelts are useless if they are not used. Who does he think pays for accident victims? Are payments for hospital, car, etc., made from two separate pools, one from those who use seatbelts, and one from those who exercise their freedom not to wear seatbelts?

I find motorcycle helmets irritating and detrimental to my peripheral vision, but I'd hate to have to explain that my crushed vertebrae were the result of a 20-mph spillout that should have left me bruised and maybe broken, but not crippled for life. I would take consolation in the fact that Silva's higher insurance premiums were helping to pay for the maintenance of my freedom.

And how about my freedom to drink and drive? Those nasty mothers (Mothers Against Drunk Drivers) have really been trying to erode my fun, I mean freedom. And why should I stop smoking? I'm really looking forward to coughing my lungs out in an oxygen tent during my golden years.

Sure, it's a burden on my family and loved ones, not to mention a senseless waste of health care facilities and expenses.

I'm afraid Silva has made the classic mistake of confusing freedom with license. Humans are greedy and selfish beings, and unless prevented, we will take advantage of society when we can.

So the next time you think your freedom is violated, ask yourself whether you are willing to accept, alone, responsibility for the consequences of your freedoms.

ASK has value as student legislative lobby

Editor,

Re: Daniel Parkinson's letter, "Education loses with 'political' allocations," in the May 1 Collegian.

Let me say first that Parkinson is one in a lonely line of those who feel the work of the Associated Students of Kansas is either worthless or wasteful.

If Parkinson, or others who are so quick to condemn, would bother to ask what ASK worked for this year, as would be the action of an educated person, he would learn the facts which both he and sometimes the Collegian fail to recognize:

— Less than 5 percent of the ASK budget has been spent on the issue of the drinking age.

— ASK has testified on more than 15 different issues this legislative year alone.

— ASK is responsible for the work-study program, which next year will deliver over $100,000 to students at K-State.

— ASK wrote and pushed for a Kansas Teacher Scholarship program.

— The ASK office at K-State has offered assistance to many students, addressing a myriad of concerns.

— ASK lobbied in support of more stringent DUI and ID laws and supports outlawing "Drink and Drown" nights.

If you still don't believe ASK is a worthy organization, then perhaps excerpts from recent letters of support will help:

"Your work on the work-study appropriation, as well as other social issues which impact your membership, was the balancing factor in many instances," said Bob Wootton, Gov. Carlin's legislative liaison.

"As a person who has dedicated most of his life to the advancement of higher education in the state of Kansas, I want to commend you and the many members of the Associated Students of Kansas for your good work."

"I was a member of the legislature from 1959 to 1969. During that time there was no statewide voice for college and university students. In my opinion ASK is now performing a very important service for the Kansas student population," said John Conard, former speaker of the House.

Media ignores judging team

Editor,

I'm writing in respect to the lack of coverage this year, by the Royal Purple and Collegian, of the outstanding achievements of K-State's Livestock Judging Team.

K-State has always been known as one of the leading agricultural colleges in the nation, and yet our student publications fail to recognize the hard working, dedicated individuals who represent our University in judging competitions across the nation.

How many students, faculty and staff realize this year's Livestock Judging Team won the national championship and that a team member from K-State was the top individual at that competition?

If our basketball or football teams would have won a national championship, they would have received enormous coverage. Why shouldn't our livestock judging team, as a representative of the College of Agriculture and K-State, receive the same respect?

Livestock teams are, after all, an intercollegiate activity, and members spend countless hours traveling and judging, working with diligence and dedication to better themselves.

You would think that winning the national championship and bringing home over $200,000 worth of trophies and awards in one season would at least warrant on picture in the 480-page Royal Purple. I hope in future years the Student Publications staff can do something to remedy this situation so our livestock judging team can get the recognition it deserves.

Black vote spurs achievements

There's a black man with a black cat living in a black neighborhood. He's got an interstate running through his front yard. You know he thinks he's got it so good. And there's a woman in the kitchen cleaning up the evening slop. And he looks at her and says, "Darlin' I can remember when you could stop a clock."

Those are some of the words to a popular song titled "Pink Houses" by John Cougar Mellencamp that takes a very candid look at black society and the hard times that are a reality for millions of black people today.

Because of the bleak conditions of their lives, many blacks, especially youths, find it difficult to exercise their patriotism by voting in a presidential election. After all, isn't America the same country that held blacks as slaves since 1619? Isn't America the same country that wouldn't grant blacks suffrage, because in our forefathers' minds, voting was an integral part of being a true American?

Voting and the need for citizen input into the workings of our government were so important that the founding fathers went to war with the British in order to gain suffrage. After they won independence, Thomas Jefferson wrote just how important voting and the concept of freedom is in the Declaration of Independence.

The words in the declaration's preamble are beautiful ideals for government to hold. But to black youths of America, what do these words mean?

It is a known fact that blacks were not held in high esteem at the time the Declaration of Independence was written. As a matter of fact, blacks were not thought of as men or women; they were only property.

Things went unchanged for decades, with blacks being denied any rights because they were slaves. After slavery was abolished, blacks were still denied the right to vote for various reasons, the most famous of these being the "Grandfather Clause." This was a law that stated if your ancestors (grandfathers) didn't vote, neither could you.

Another device that kept blacks away from the polls was the definition of citizenship. Citizenship was not granted to blacks because they were still regarded as property, not people; and after all, how could property be considered citizenry?

CHRIS THOMAS
Guest Columnist

These and other restraints kept blacks away from the polls until the passage of the 14th and 15th Amendments to the Constitution. The 14th Amendment granted blacks citizenship, and the 15th Amendment states that race will be no factor in regard to the right to vote or hold office.

The passage of these two amendments did not come quickly or easily. Many hundreds of blacks were harassed, tortured and killed by whites who didn't want blacks to be allowed to vote.

These lynchings and other discriminatory devices were still used until the late 1960s, when the 24th Amendment and the Voting Rights Act were passed. The 24th Amendment abolished the poll tax (tax payable as a requirement of voting), and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 abolished all restrictions on those rights in federal elections.

The problem is that although we do have the power to vote, many young blacks feel they have no reason to vote. Why? Young blacks feel they have a right to be apathetic because America, in their opinion, has done nothing but oppress blacks.

This is a feeling that can be understood by most if one remembers the turbulent 1960s, when blacks were still fighting for simple rights such as being served in the same restaurants with whites or riding in the front of buses.

But since the 1960s, some remarkable changes have occurred. In most cases, blacks today enjoy a higher standard of living and higher level of education than most blacks in Africa or Third World countries. Test scores among black students have risen steadily over the past few years.

Blacks today are now living in society circles that were once a white man's world. Many black athletes and entertainers are now making more money than the president of the United States, which is quite an accomplishment considering we blacks were once nothing more than pieces of property.

Although blacks have made major advances in many different areas, the most important area that blacks continue to make gains in is the political arena. We now have black mayors in some of the largest cities in America: Detroit, Los Angeles, Chicago, Atlanta and Philadelphia. We even have a black presidential candidate who has beaten opponents that at one time tried to stand in the way of black equality.

Over the years, there have been many songs, poems, books and plays prompting the spirit of black Americans to never die, but to forge on. Now I challenge young black voters to become active and vote in the upcoming presidential elections.

I am not saying that we should vote only for black politicians, but we should vote for the person who can further advancement of blacks in America. The only way to defeat the evils of racism is through voting and making sure our interests are being considered.

Remember the movements of extremist black power groups in the 1960s and the small results they achieved? A few went back to Africa and a small number of whites were convinced of the black plight, but for the most part these movements were ineffective because nothing was really changed.

Remember the more peaceful movements that used the law to achieve equality? These movements are the ones that led to bills being passed allowing blacks to enjoy the luxuries we have today, and although we must continue to work to lift all blacks from oppressive poverty, many of us do have luxuries. Think of all those professional athletes, entertainers, doctors, lawyers and politicians. All of this would have probably never come about without the laws that allowed us to vote.

Remember that with every gain we achieve, the looser the chains that once oppressed black people become. We will no longer be slaves to the political system, but the system will be a servant to us.

Parachutists successful in spite of accident

Editor,

Re: "Parachutist injured in exhibition accident," in the April 30 Collegian:

I found the article concerning the injured parachutist your typical "let's only tell the public the negative aspects of parachuting and propel more myths into the minds of the American people."

You failed to mention the three jumpers that made perfect landings into the opening of the Special Olympics. You failed to mention that the skydivers were the highlight of the day for many children, that the K-State Parachute Club made this exhibition jump free gratis (with the exception of the insurance).

You also neglected to mention the number of parachute club members who have jumped in various demonstrations without getting hurt. Granted, skydiving is a hazardous sport, but with the safety precautions the club takes, the thrills outweigh injuries by far.

Fraternity funding helps Special Olympics

Editor,

Re: "A very special Olympics," in the April 30 Collegian:

I wish to compliment your newspaper for the excellent coverage of the Special Olympics. Dallas Hasenbank and Jeff Taylor are to be commended for excellent coverage. It's refreshing to see positive rather than negative press about the fraternities.

The Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity is to be congratulated for supporting such a worthy cause. As director of Financial Counseling at the Family Center, I appreciate the lift the monetary support gives to "special" parents I counsel. Without such support, some parents of special children could not chaperone at the state meet because they can't afford to pay for lodging, meals and transportation.

Keep up your good work, Lambda Chi Alpha! You've lifted the financial burden for many parents who appreciate your support.

Police find cocaine, heroin in safe

JUNCTION CITY — Police found about $33,000 worth of heroin and cocaine Monday when they opened a safe confiscated during a drug raid last week.

Police Capt. Fred Uhrig said officers confiscated the safe Friday during a raid on a north Junction City apartment. During that raid, officers found 29½ pounds of marijuana worth about $23,000, Uhrig said. No arrests have been made and Uhrig declined to say if any were expected.

Uhrig said the raid came after a brief undercover operation. "It just happened. We made a buy (of illegal drugs) and got a search warrant," he said.

Along with the marijuana and the safe, officers found small amounts of white powder, believed to be cocaine, Uhrig said. They also found several guns and a large amount of drug paraphernalia, he said.

The safe was opened Monday after officers got a warrant to search its contents, Uhrig said. They found about half a pound of cocaine, with an estimated street value of $31,250, he said. The safe also contained about six ounces of heroin, worth about $1,640, and about $300 worth of LSD.

Concert ends with injuries, arrests

SEATTLE — Rock music went out with a bang at the Seattle Center Coliseum as at least 22 people were injured and 45 citations were issued during a performance by Van Halen.

In addition, police Lt. Roy Wedlund said six people were arrested on charges that included assaults on four police officers.

About 50 people were kicked out of the Monday night concert by the popular band, which drew a sellout crowd of about 15,000 people, Wedlund added. Most of those who were cited were minors charged with possession of alcohol, marijuana or fireworks, he said.

The concert was the last before the start of a $3 million renovation of the coliseum, which is being shut down through mid-July.

Jane Fonda tries to help dissident

NEW YORK — Actress Jane Fonda says her five-day trip to the Soviet Union will help Jewish dissident Ida Nudel avoid harassment, but she acknowledges "there is no way I can know" whether Nudel will be allowed to immigrate to Israel.

It was Nudel's first visit from foreigners since she was exiled to Siberia six years ago, Fonda said when she returned Monday.

Nudel and her sister, Elena Friedman, applied to emigrate from the Soviet Union to Israel in 1971. Friedman was allowed to leave but Nudel was not.

Shortly afterward, Nudel hung a banner from her apartment window that read, "KGB, Give Me a Visa to Israel." The National Conference on Soviet Jewry said Nudel was tried for "malicious hooliganism" and sentenced to four years in internal exile in Siberia, where she was "tortured with hunger."

She was released two years ago and presently lives in Bendery, where she met with Fonda, Soviet law expert Marshall Grossman and Stephen Rivers, Fonda's press secretary.

Court ruling may raise railroad taxes

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — State tax officials on Tuesday hailed a federal appeals court ruling in a 1980 case brought by railroads in Kansas, saying it could restore up to $6 million in annual property tax revenues to counties.

"It's what we would call a complete victory," said Carol Bonebrake, director of taxation in the Department of Revenue.

The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals partially overturned a decision by a Topeka federal judge who had ordered a 60 percent cut in property taxes paid by railroads in Kansas' 105 counties.

That ruling, handed down in 1982, meant a reduction of more than $8 million and prompted many counties to raise tax levies to offset the losses.

The appeals court ruling, which was issued last Friday in Denver, could return up to $6 million in property tax revenues lost by counties when U.S. District Judge Richard Rogers ordered the reductions for 10 railroads in the case.

Moreover, the ruling will apply to three other similar property tax lawsuits brought by railroads in Kansas and pending before Rogers.

"If this decision stands, you're looking at $24 million the railroads will have to cough up," said Bonebrake.

"Basically as the ruling came down, they gave us about everything we argued was required under the law. They bought our position across the board."

In addition, the ruling could have an effect on similar railroad tax lawsuits in other states, including Colorado and Oklahoma.

The appeals court directed Rogers to recalculate the tax rate he used in trimming the assessments of railroads in Kansas, saying the Topeka federal judge should have included personal property, which includes equipment and inventories, in his computations instead of using only real property, or real estate.

The railroads contended in the lawsuit that their property was unfairly assessed at rates higher than other similar property. They called for equalization and argued their higher assessments violated a 1976 federal law, the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act, which prohibits tax discrimination by states against railroads.

Railroad property has been taxed at 12.4 percent since Rogers' decision in April 1982. Before that, according to the state, it was taxed at 30 percent of its fair market value.

Phil Martin, director of the state Division of Property Valuation, said the appeals court ruling could increase the assessment rate to 24 percent, which would raise railroad taxes by nearly $6 million annually.

He and Bonebrake said the decision should boost the assessment rate to at least 19 percent and perhaps as much as 20-24 percent of fair market value. Each 1 percent increase equals about $500,000 in tax revenue.

The Kansas cases are part of a legal battle waged nationwide by railroads to cut their property taxes using the federal anti-tax discrimination law. The unfair taxation issue has been raised in nearly 30 states.

Under state law, all property is to be assessed and taxed on a uniform and equal basis. However, real estate has not been reappraised for two decades and Bonebrake conceded that the state did not expect a court to determine 30 percent as the current assessment level for railroads.

Both the state of Kansas and the railroads appealed Rogers' 1982 ruling. The state considered the tax reduction too drastic and the railroads asked for part of their 1979 property taxes to be refunded.

Rogers had ruled that the railroads applied for the refund too late and the appeals court upheld that decision.

When the judge heard the case in 1982, a major argument was whether railroad property should be compared for tax purposes only to commercial and industrial real property or both real and personal property.

The railroads contended it would be virtually impossible to prepare a valid study of actual sales and tax assessments of personal commercial and industrial property.

The appeals court directed Rogers to permit the railroads to prove their contention that a sales study could not be developed.

Nichols committee selects 4 art finalists

The Nichols Hall Art Committee has moved a step closer to commissioning an artist to complete artwork for the lobby of Nichols.

The committee is sponsoring the Nichols Hall Art Competition which is open to artists in Kansas, Oklahoma, Texas, Colorado, Nebraska, Iowa and Missouri. Artists in these states were asked to submit slides of work they have completed in the past three years, said Jerry Katlin, graduate in public administration and former student body president. From these slides, the committee has selected the following four finalists:

— Eric Bransby, professor at the University of Missouri at Kansas City, for oil painting.

— Roger Routson, assistant professor of art at K-State, for abstract acrylic painting.

— Philip Green, senior in art at K-State, for wood sculpture.

— Mark Smith, professor of art at Texas Women's University, for oil landscapes.

The models are due June 8, and the committee will meet June 13. An artist is expected to be commissioned by June 15, said Lori Leu, senior in social sciences and former Student Senate chairman.

Student interest in nuclear freeze slows

By The College Press Service

Last April students across the country staged large rallies and demonstrations in favor of a bilateral freeze on the production of nuclear weaponry.

Approximately 400 campuses joined in the playing of "Firebreaks," a game meant to show the dynamics of a nuclear exchange between the United States and the Soviet Union.

According to one estimate, more than 50 campus-based faculty groups passed resolutions favoring a freeze.

But this spring, the campus freeze movement may be melting down.

Although there are many freeze-related events taking place on American campuses and organizers stress they have changed strategies, some campus-based organizers say they're having a hard time motivating students and faculty members this year.

"In a way, it is absolutely not the trendy thing to get involved with," Bobbi Patterson, associate chaplain at Emory University in Atlanta, said.

"Last year was a real busy year," Dail Mullins, graduate student and freeze activist at the University of Alabama, said. "This year has probably been our slowest year. I'm not sure why that's so."

"Students just seem more interested in clothes than in what they'll be doing in the next five years," said Lance Bocarsly, president of Students for a Nuclear Free Zone at the University of California at Los Angeles.

Statistics are hard to come by. Last year's "Firebreaks" game, however, reached about 3,000 colleges, high schools and community groups. This April, Ground Zero, the group that invented and distributed the game, said there are 1,200 groups playing "Firebreaks II."

Last year, United Campuses to Prevent Nuclear War (UCAM) claimed to have close to 100 active college chapters.

This April, UCAM field director Phil Antweiler said 63 chapters are active.

But Antweiler and other national freeze leaders stress the movement has changed, not melted down.

"We're beyond the stage where we need to scare people on this issue," Antweiler said.

Instead of organizing mass rallies and demonstrations, UCAM this spring is concentrating on quieter actions like voter registration and making sure voters force candidates to take a stand on nuclear weapons issues.

"First we tried to change the politicians' minds, and now we'll try to change the politicians," said David Heckman of Freeze Voter '84, which is trying to involve students in about 30 U.S. House and 10 Senate races this fall.

Freeze Voter '84, based in Washington, D.C., is recruiting students and faculty members to volunteer to work in certain targeted campaigns and will pay volunteers' housing, living and travel expenses.

"We've done the referenda, we've done the letter-writing, we've done the lobbying," Heckman said. "Now maybe it's time to change the government a little."

To win elections, he said, "we're not going to be organizing huge marches. The way you win elections is not so much by gathering a large number of people. The way you win is by hard, labor-intensive work like contacting voter after voter after voter."

By that measure, Antweiler said there's a growing amount of activity in colleges.

By other measures, it was only last fall that a significant number of campuses held large rallies and demonstrations in the wake of ABC's broadcast of "The Day After," a movie about the aftermath of a nuclear exchange.

Students at many universities and colleges held active rallies in favor of a nuclear freeze and often in opposition to U.S. deployment of new missiles in Europe during the last week of October and first weeks of November 1983.

Many of this spring's activities, moreover, are reminiscent of freeze activities of April 1982 and 1983.

Teach-ins and symposiums are scheduled this month at places as diverse as Tennessee and Dartmouth, which will host the "Ivy League Conference on the Issues of Nuclear Arms."

No organizers, however, deny there are fewer such activities scheduled this year. "It's a more mature issue," Antweiler said.

"It's not a new idea anymore," Patterson said.

Study shows decline in home ownership

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The share of Americans who own their own homes has declined for the first time in at least 20 years, the Census Bureau said Tuesday.

Housing costs and other economic factors were blamed by housing experts questioned about the figures.

The drop in ownership between 1980 and 1983 was disclosed in a special study on homeownership trends, which also indicated that the ownership decline may have eased by the end of last year.

The share of U.S. households that owned their home dropped from 65.6 percent in 1980 to 64.6 percent last year, after gradually declining in 1981 and 1982, according to the report, part of a series prepared for several years but not previously published.

That was the first "statistically significant" decline since the bureau began quarterly reports on homeownership in 1962, said Wallace Fraser of the bureau's Current Surveys Branch.

But Fraser added that the quarterly ownership figures for 1983 remained almost constant, which may indicate that the decline has slowed, or that homeownership rates are remaining steady.

"We've noticed the trend. It is disconcerting," Ken Kerin, vice president for research of the National Association of Realtors, said of the decline from 1980 to 1983.

A decline of about 1 percent in ownership doesn't sound like much, but it represents over half of the gain made during the entire decade of the 1970s, Kerin pointed out. The Census study shows an ownership increase of about 1.5 percent during that decade.

"The reason is affordability," said Kerin. "We talk about affordability a lot. It is real and it has an impact on people."

"Unfortunately, we do not see the affordability situation getting better in the next few years," he added.

Realtor News, a publication of his organization, warned last December that unless housing sales improve, American homeownership could fall below 60 percent by the turn of the century.

Housing sales picked up a bit last year, but haven't improved much this year, Kerin said, adding that he has no reason to be very optimistic about next year.

Michael Sumichrast, chief economist at the National Association of Home Builders, was more positive, however.

There is no question 1979 through 1983 were "pretty rotten years" for homeownership because of the economy, he said. People were losing jobs in many areas and "when people are in the soup line, they don't buy homes."

But the economy has improved and home ownership is looking up too, he said.

"The situation has changed. I don't think there's any question new construction is up" and the availability of money and jobs is better, and interest rates have improved, Sumichrast said.

Commission to proceed with AT&T rate case

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Corporation Commission has scheduled a hearing later this month to determine how to proceed on a request for a $12 million rate increase by AT&T Communications of the Southwest.

The rate case, which was filed last October, could be dismissed or continued by the commission after the hearing on May 29.

However, neither of those actions would immediately alter rates for long distance telephone calls charged by AT&T, which provides service for long distance calls between area codes in Kansas.

The company's rates were set last December on a temporary basis by the commission. The charges are the same as long distance rates for Southwestern Bell Telephone Co., which provides long distance service within area codes in Kansas.

AT&T filed its rate case on Oct. 21, 1983, asking for 30 percent higher charges to generate an additional $23.7 million annually. That was later reduced to $20.9 million.

The commission approved interim rates for the company which generate about $12 million annually. Those charges, which took effect in January, are subject to refund with interest pending a final decision in the case.

Hearings on AT&T's original rate case were scheduled in early April, but the company reduced its request and said $12 million was adequate. Both AT&T and the KCC staff then asked for a hearing before the commission on whether the rate case should be dismissed or continued.

If the rate case is dismissed, AT&T could refile and seek a permanent increase in rates based on financial information on its operations since divestiture took effect in January.

Lack of information on the effects of the AT&T break-up has been the primary cause of delays in the case.

If the case is continued, the commission would have until June 18 to schedule rate hearings and then another 20 days to issue a decision. Under Kansas law, the commission must act on utility rate cases within 240 days from the time of filing or the entire higher charges automatically take effect.

Additionally, AT&T could ask the commission to suspend the 240-day deadline. That has never happened, however.

Drug may give hope to severe acne victims

By BECKY WILEY
Collegian Reporter

It is called everything from a complexion problem to zits. But whatever the euphemism, the problem is the same. Acne is a nuisance for almost everyone upon entering their teens.

For some, acne is only a minor problem to be endured for only a few years. But for approximately 20 million other Americans, acne can be a disease serious enough to cause scars.

It's for the sufferers of severe acne that a new, expensive, yet much debated acne drug called Accutane was developed.

Dr. Robert Cathey, a Manhattan dermatologist, began prescribing Accutane to his patients in fall 1982 and said he considers it to be a large part of his practice.

The oral medication has been highly successful in the treatment of cystic acne, a type of acne which is a severe and disfiguring disease. If acne were to be graded on a scale of one to four (mild to severe), cystic acne would be considered grade four, according to a pamphlet published by Hoffmann-LaRoche Inc., the company which researched and developed the drug.

"I use (prescribe) a lot of it because I see a lot of patients with inflammatory cystic acne. However, it's not one of the treatments I will prescribe to an individual only after seeing a person once or twice," Cathey said.

He said he uses conventional treatments such as antibiotics, topical applications (benzoyl peroxide for example), or freezing crystal (Freon 12 to help reduce inflammation) before prescribing Accutane.

"Accutane is basically used as the final method of treatment for patients. It should only be used on patients who have been refractory or resistant to the regular conventional treatment," he said.

While Accutane is a highly effective drug, it also is a serious one with several drawbacks to be considered before using it.

Cathey insists his patients be aware of the side-effects connected with the drug.

The most prevalent of Accutane's effects is drying of the body's mucous membranes. Clinical studies report that 90 percent of Accutane patients will have chapped lips, while 80 percent will experience dry skin and itching.

A more serious effect of the drug is the possibility of birth defects. If a patient is of childbearing potential, an effective form of contraception must be used and continued for one month after discontinuing Accutane therapy.

Nursing mothers also are advised not to take Accutane because of the possibility of adverse effects to their children.

Cathey gives his female patients a pregnancy test before prescribing the drug, and he counsels them throughout their treatment.

He said other side effects such as mild nosebleeds, swollen eyelids, joint and muscle pains, rashes and increased sensitivity to sunburn have been known to occur, but that they aren't as prevalent.

Another consideration connected with the use of Accutane is the expense involved.

Cathey said one 40-milligram tablet costs $1.65, which totals $3.30 for the average dose of two pills per day.

"The therapy could run into several hundreds of dollars because the patient must pay for lab tests and antibiotics office treatments as well as the pills," he said.

One of final considerations patients must consider before taking Accutane is the time involved; the drug doesn't cause overnight miracles.

"Some patients don't see much improvement until after six weeks. The treatment may last from two to four months," Cathey said.

Cathey offered words of encouragement, however. He said that once patients have completed their treatment with Accutane, their skin may stay completely clear without any further treatment.

Shuttle

polled thought fees of $5 a week would be reasonable, 8 percent were undecided and 8 percent said they would have been unable to use the service if there were a fee structure.

When the task force considered recommending the fee structure, a primary consideration was how to collect the fees, Leu said.

"If the driver has to collect the money, it's not safe for him. If they (handicapped students) are going to bring in the fee, it had to be in a building they could get into."

The task force recommended in its report a fee of $1 a day for temporarily handicapped students to ride the shuttle. This fee has an upper limit of $40 a semester, which may save a student up to $35. The fee would be collected in the Student Government Services office in the Union.

"The SGS office is the best place (at which) to pay because it is centrally located and is in the most accessible building on campus," Leu said.

Funding from two outside sources, the United Way and the Easter Seal Society, also was considered. The task force decided not to present a plan to the United Way.

"We looked into the United Way, but it required too much to write up the plan and we didn't think we fit the qualifications for funding," she said. "Anything mandated by federal law is not eligible for funding from the United Way." This would prohibit permanently handicapped students from using the service, Leu said.

A plan was presented to the Easter Seal Society but was not accepted for funding. This rejection came after Leu presented the task force report to senate. However, the task force had recommended implementation of the fee structure regardless of Easter Seal's response.

The task force report was the basis of the Finance Committee's recommendation for Students for Handicapped Concerns funding for the 1984-1985 school year.

Senate allocated the organization $1,957.41 for 1983-1984. Students for Handicapped Concerns requested $2,934.80 for 1984-1985. However, the Finance Committee recommendation, which was later accepted by the senate, was $2,134.80. This was based on the task force estimate that the user fee would generate $800.

The fee structure will be implemented in the fall, Holden said. There is no shuttle service during the summer.

Want To Sell Your Books ?

Question: How does the Union Bookstore determine how much your books are worth when you sell them back?

Answer: If the Bookstore has notification from the instructor that the books are to be re-adopted for use the next semester, and if the Bookstore does not already have a sufficient stock on hand, then you will be offered 60% of the publisher's current list price.

For example: If a book sells for $10 new and it meets the requirements noted above, the book would be bought from you for $6.

If the Bookstore has not received notice that the book will be used again, or if it already has a sufficient stock on hand, the book would be worth the current wholesale price as indicated by one of the nation's largest jobbers of used textbooks.

If you have any questions about the price being paid for a textbook, the buyer will be happy to answer any questions which you may have regarding the price paid.

Question: Is 60% the usual price paid for textbooks around the country?

Answer: Definitely not. Most stores in the United States pay only 50% for books being used again. The Union Bookstore is one of the few stores which pays 60%. And remember, we pay cash. You don't have to take your money out in trade.

Question: What about paperbacks? Does the 60% policy apply to them too?

Answer: Yes. The Union Bookstore does not penalize you on paperbacks. If they are being used again, and if the bookstore needs them, you will receive 60% of the publisher's list price.

Question: If the publisher's price has gone up since I bought my books, will I receive the benefit of that price increase?

Answer: Yes. For instance, if you bought your book for $9 and the publisher's list price is now $10, you will get $6, not $5.40.

Feed science study provides satisfaction

Woman adopts non-traditional curriculum

By STEVE SWAFFORD
Collegian Reporter

Julie Bohnert, sophomore in feed science and management, lugged a 50-pound bag of seed over to the pallet in the store room. She worked right next to three men on her 1:30-5 p.m. shift at the pilot mill in Shellenberger Hall.

Bohnert is only the third woman to enroll in the curriculum in the entire free world.

Bohnert said that since eighth grade, she wanted to be a veterinarian because she loved animals. Bohnert changed her mind at orientation at K-State when she learned what it took to get accepted into the College of Veterinary Medicine. She said she didn't have the experience needed to be accepted.

Bohnert said she decided on her major for two main reasons.

"It (feed science and management) sounded fun and there were too many people in animal science to get a good job," Bohnert said.

Growing up in Shawnee, Bohnert was not exposed to any agriculture-related organizations.

"I really didn't know what 4-H was until I was a senior (in high school) and I never really knew anybody in 4-H until some friends of mine in high school told me they were involved with it," she said.

Bohnert admitted with a smile she has never lived on a farm as she sat there on the back loading dock in her white hard-hat, faded Levi's, worn cowboy boots and a purple scarf in her right back pocket.

Although she has never lived on a farm, Bohnert has enjoyed riding horses for several years.

"Wherever we lived I would go to the nearest rental stables to ride. Dad even told me that if I could afford a place to keep it and feed it, he would buy a horse for me," Bohnert said.

Bohnert has two younger sisters still at home, and she said she doesn't think they will go into an agriculture related field when they come to college.

She said her friends are surprised when they find out what she is studying, but Bohnert said she gets tired when she has to constantly explain what her major is at K-State.

"I just like seeing their expressions when I tell them that I did it because it (feed science and management) sounded fun," Bohnert said with a mischievous grin.

Being one of the few women involved in this area of agriculture, she said it does have some distinctive drawbacks.

"One thing that was bad was when I went to a convention in Kansas City, and I hung around a couple of guys from school that were friends. Many of the men there brought their wives, and much of the time they (people at the convention) thought I was their (her friends') date," she said.

When she talks about what she wants to do in the future, she is optimistic about her job possibilities. Bohnert said she looks at her position as an advantage in a male-dominated field.

"I want to be a regional manager for Ralston-Purina," she said. She admits that she will miss doing the manual labor that she is now doing at the mill.

Bohnert said that when she begins looking for a job and a permanent residence, she does not want to live in the East. She said she would prefer to live in Colorado.

She enjoys snow skiing, water skiing, racketball, fishing, hunting, four-wheeling, canoeing and spending time outdoors.

Bohnert said the men she works with at Shellenberger Hall don't treat her differently because she is a woman.

"I guess I proved myself to the guys that I can do the work, she said.

Although she has proven herself, she said she does not feel women are equal to men. She said men are built for more physically deman-

Julie Bohnert, sophomore in feed science and management, is in a unique position as one of three women to ever major in that field. Bohnert works as a volunteer in the pilot mill in Shellenberger Hall to gain experience until she can move into a full-time position there next year.

ding jobs than women.

"I'm not for women's lib, and I don't believe women are completely equal, but I believe women should have equal pay," she said.

Bohnert is working voluntarily at her job at Shellenberger this year, but next year her supervisor said she will be a paid employee. She now works about 15 hours a week at the mill.

Along with her practical experience at the mill, she takes her academics seriously and said she doesn't consider herself just another number or face in the classroom.

"It's not how much the teacher interacts with the students, it's how much you want to interact to learn," she said.

She said she likes to keep a busy schedule, but also appreciates her time by herself.

"If I had a laidback schedule I'd go crazy, but there are other times when I just want to be alone," she said.

Poultry tradition unknown to many farmers

Modern mechanization replaces egg candling techniques

By DIONA NACE
Collegian Reporter

Like many of the practices used on farms in the past, egg candling by hand may be a skill which is fading into obscurity like the butter churn and milking stool.

Egg candling is the process which eggs must go through to be sized and graded. Myron Lawson, an employee of the K-State poultry unit and egg candler, said. Through candling, the size of the air cell (all eggs have an air space), blood spots, meat spots and cracks can be determined.

Even the average farmer may not know what candling is or how to do it.

"Years ago a lot of farmers candled eggs, now you have to hunt pretty darn hard to even find chickens on the farm," he said.

Lawson said that currently, eggs are candled by machine, but "egg candling has never been mechanized so that you don't need a human to do it. Now there are blood detectors to find blood spots, but you still need someone to take out the egg (from the machine)."

The U.S. Department of Agriculture has established standards for both the interior and exterior of eggs. The USDA standard classifications for exteriors of eggs are A, B, and dirty. Interior classifications are AA, A, B or loss, Lawson said.

He said the exterior classification of "dirty" refers to the appearance of dirt, feathers or stains on the egg. Eggs are washed before they are candled, but sometimes the dirt or feathers stick to them and therefore the eggs can't be sold.

Dirt has absolutely nothing to do with the interior quality of the egg, Lawson said, but it is distracting to consumers. The interior classification "loss" is placed on eggs with large egg cells, which effect the quality of the egg whites. Lawson said that the larger the egg cell, the less room there is for the yolk and white.

Another factor which affects egg quality is age.

"As you age an egg, the albumin (egg white) will get thinner, but the yolk will stay pretty much the same," Lawson said.

An egg can be artificially aged through repeated coolings and warmings. Lawson said eggs should be stored at 50 degrees. But if those eggs are repeatedly allowed to warm to room temperature and recooled, they can be down-graded quickly.

"Normally you can store eggs at 50 degrees for three to four weeks before an A grade will go down to a B grade," he said.

Lawson said he has been candling eggs for 15 years, "ever since I came to work here. When I started working here, the only man who candled eggs was the boss. By watching him and keeping up on the standards, I learned how to candel eggs."

"Now, there is one other guy out here who candles eggs," he said. "It really isn't hard to learn, but it does take a lot of practice. At first you'll miss some of your smaller blood spots, but it's not a hard process to learn," Lawson said.

Lawson said the poultry unit currently handles 120 to 130 dozen of eggs daily.

"The machine we use is made to run 10 cases in an hour if you use both lanes, but we use only one," he said.

"You don't find many machines like the one we use. In fact, it is 20 years old, and the company that made it isn't even in business anymore. Most of the egg candling machines can handle the eggs from 300,000 layers (chickens) in four to five hours.

"It's a quick process, except when you're first beginning because you don't know the right amount of air cell and can't find the blood spots fast enough. But with this machine, anything that shows the least little red, I take it out. On some eggs I'll say, 'I don't like that egg' and take it out without thinking about it," Lawson said.

He said he spends only five seconds at most on each egg.

Lawson said that since he began candling eggs, the USDA has become more lenient in its standards. When the USDA combined the C and B grades into just the B grade, he said the grading became simpler and the standards easier to meet.

The interior defects of the egg, such as the meat spot or the blood spot, are picked up as the yolk is released from the follicle. Exterior faults include body checks, rough shells and cracks. Lawson said body checks occur when an egg shell cracks before the hen lays the egg.

"When a hen has had a body crack, she can weld it back together, it will be a B grade egg because it will have a thin spot. It also will have a ridge where it was repaired," Lawson said.

Rough shells, he said, can be caused by two things.

"They can be inherited or be caused by old age. As a hen gets older, she lays thinner-shelled eggs," Lawson said.

Cracks are one exterior fault that effects the interior quality of the egg, Lawson said.

"A cracked egg lets air in and greatly increases the evaporation rate of the albumin and yolk."

Lawson said the USDA allows 2 percent of the eggs to contain foreign material, such as blood spots or meat spots; 7 percent cracked eggs; and 0.5 percent human error in grading the eggs.

Lawson said that when he gives public demonstrations of egg candling, as he will be doing at the upcoming Folk Life Festival on May 5-6, he describes the differences in the three different types of lights he uses at the poultry unit. The oldest of the three lights, similar to a viewscope, was patented in 1913. Another is a homemade box with a light bulb, and the third is the machine the poultry unit uses daily.

Dance swings from country beat to 'prep step' Boccie

By KRISTI YEARGIN
Contributing Writer

On Monday evenings, the small, wooden dance floor in the Rockin' K bar quickly fills when Bertra Wendland yells, "It's 7 o'clock. All people for swing dance lessons get out on the floor!"

Men and women line the edge of the dance floor dressed in everything from traditional western wear such as boots, jeans and plaid shirts, to active wear such as tennis shoes, rugby shirts and corduroy pants.

But everyone is here to learn the same dancing style from Wendland. The continuous movements in which partners join hands, do quick turns and swing in circles around the dance floor to country music have become an exciting and popular style of dance to people of all ages in the West.

However, country swing dancing did not become popular overnight. It has been around since the 1930s, Wendland said.

The swing style of dancing was developed in western Texas with the help of the country band Bob Wells and the Texas Playboys, she said.

"They were the first country group to use a drummer, but the people called the dancing 'Western Swing,'" Wendland said.

Steve (Mac) McKenzie, owner of the Rockin' K, said people first danced to Wells' country music, but then the dancing style changed in the 1940s to a big band sound instead of country. As time passed, the dance was modified to fit the rock 'n' roll music of the 1950s, and people began to "jitterbug," he said.

Today, swing dancing in the West has reverted to its original form, using country music.

In the East, however, where people tend to be less concerned with western clothing styles or country music, swing dancing is done to an entirely different style of music.

"It's the same steps, but we dance to beach music or 'be-bop' songs," said Cindy Miller, junior at the University of Virginia. "We call it the 'prep step,' and everyone here tries to learn it."

But at the Rockin' K, Wendland gives swing dance lessons to country music. She has been giving lessons there for about 1½ years and offers several sessions for beginning or advanced dancers throughout the year.

"There are approximately 70 people a session, which averages about 400 people a year," she said, "and that's not counting advanced lessons."

In beginning lessons, Wendland teaches the Texas two-step, the Cotton-Eyed Joe and 19 other swing moves. The steps become more difficult in the advanced lessons, where she teaches five more swing moves, two polkas and two other dances.

Although Wendland gives swing dance lessons, neither she nor McKenzie has taken lessons. Both learned by watching others.

"Kids dance at rodeo and wedding dances," McKenzie said. "We all watched what the adults were doing, and eventually we started doing it."

"Swing dancing brings dancers into contact, and they have to develop an awareness of their partner and know what the other is thinking. It also encourages people to talk while dancing," she said.

Even the people taking the lessons agree that it is a more enjoyable way to dance than fast dancing to rock music and that there is more partner involvement.

"It's better than just standing on the dance floor jumping around," Paul Krueger, sophomore in information systems, said.

"I took swing dance lessons because my friends all seemed to be having so much fun and wanted me to join," Yvonne Hanson, freshman in general home economics, said.

Donna Olberding, sophomore in pre-professional business administration, had other things on her mind when she signed up for the lessons.

"I'm looking for a western man," she said, "and I figure I'll find one if I can swing dance."

Although the movie "Urban Cowboy" brought fame to Gilley's Bar in Texas and swing dancing increased in popularity, there also was an increase in the number of people trying to look and act like western people, McKenzie said. After visiting Gilley's a few years ago,

McKenzie decided, "it was more of a tourist trap than a country bar. Before, it was just all local people, but after 'Urban Cowboy,' it became tourist people."

But Wendland does not seem to care what type of people want to learn to dance, just that they are interested. She said she enjoys swing dancing but has never entered a swing dance contest.

"They won't let me compete," she said. "I've judged contests, but they won't let me dance around here."

Wendland graduated from K-State with a degree in elementary education, and despite her day job as a clerk typist, giving lessons during the week and working on the farm on weekends, she still finds time to go dancing with her husband.

"As for my favorite dance, it's a tossup between swing dancing and the beer barrel polka," she said. "The problem is my husband can't beer barrel as well as I can swing dance."

Despite changes in music and slight variations over the years, swing dancing is still a favorite for people of all ages.

"The European boccie set consists of lead balls; they would be nice to have. Mine are plastic. But I haven't yet figured how to get a lead set back from Europe since hand carrying them would put me way over the 40-pound weight limit," Burnham said.

The weather, to date, has not been conducive to boccie playing, the K-State professors agreed, but the game isn't something easily forgotten or requiring much practice to play.

With more sun and less rain, K-State students may yet see the small group of men — that's their gesture to the Italian tradition, they said — standing around with several colored balls, not doing much, laughing among themselves and maybe even smoking. Asking them what they are doing may bring such interesting responses as "Of all things done on K-State lawns, this is certainly one of them."

But chances are it's a game of boccie being played the "K-State boccie bunch" way.

Local youth programs need summer coaches

By DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian Reporter

If you listen to Harry Caray, long-time baseball broadcaster, for any length of time, you will undoubtedly hear him proclaim in his raspy voice: "... there's nothing like fun at the old ballpark."

Children of all ages across the nation obviously agree with Caray, because little league baseball and softball programs are booming. Adults to take charge of these youths, however, are in demand, and Manhattan is one city that needs youth sports coaches for the summer, according to Mike Buchanan of the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department.

Buchanan said each baseball or softball team in the city consists of 14 players. The people who work as coaches are asked to work with these players at practices and games throughout a three-month period that begins with the opening of practices in early to mid-May and ends with the completion of the schedule in late July.

"The number of practices a coach wants to have is entirely up to him or her," Buchanan said. "Each team plays two games a week starting the June 4, and once the games start, the number of practices will probably be cut down. All in all, the process requires a coach to spend just over five hours a week in working with his team at practices and games."

According to Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for student affairs and youth sports coach in Manhattan for 13 years, the time spent in coaching is time well spent.

"I have enjoyed immensely the short- and long-term relationships I have formed with both players and parents," he said. "Since I've been coaching, not a month has passed that a former player hasn't stopped me somewhere to say hello."

Bosco said the potential to help area youth grow is one of the factors that has interested him in coaching.

"A coach obviously sees the growth of a child during the three-month period he works with him, particularly with the younger child who hasn't yet picked up all of the fundamentals of the game," he said. "Coaches have a genuine opportuty to make a difference."

According to Bosco, the three months a volunteer coach spends with his players can be an extension of the schooling process that the child takes part in the other nine months of the year.

"The volunteer is in a position to develop young people by being a good role model for them," he said.

"There is no question that a coach has a big role to play in the lives of those players he works with during the summer."

Bosco stressed that although most of the coaches in the Manhattan area are parents, K-State students also can make a difference in making the program work.

"It (coaching) may not make you a better engineer, architect, musician or mathematician, but it can do nothing but help you become a better person," Bosco said. "Students are extremely important to any undertaking in Manhattan because they are a part of the community."

Buchanan said there are coaching positions opening at all levels in both the baseball and softball programs.

"We've got four leagues in each of the boys and girls divisions," he said. "For boys we have a league for 10- and 11-year-olds, one for 12-year-olds, one for 13- and 14-year-olds and a senior league for 15- to 18-year-olds. We still need coaches in each of these four leagues, especially in the younger and older leagues."

"For girls we have a league for 10-year-olds, one for 11 and 12, one for 13 and 14, and the older 15-to-18 league."

He said softball coaches are especially needed in the younger and older divisions.

There are a total of 14 baseball teams currently without coaches, and 12 softball teams are in need of volunteer help.

Buchanan urges interested students and faculty members to contact him.

"Anyone can give me a call at my office, and I'll get them lined up with a team and give them information on the coaches' meeting and answer any questions they might have," he said.

"Coaching is time consuming, but it's all worthwhile when you see smiling faces at the end of a game."

Chiefs trade popular Green to Rams

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Fans of the Kansas City Chiefs may remember the 1984 draft more for who got shipped out than for who came on board.

The Chiefs, known around the league as the National Football League's longest rebuilding project, stunned their long-suffering followers by trading popular all-pro cornerback Gary Green to Los Angeles for the Rams' first and fifth-round choices.

Head Coach John Mackovic, who was known to resent Green's outspoken team leadership and who clashed more than once with Green, said of the trade, "I do what is in the best interests of the football team."

"Anybody who believes that," Green said from his home in San Antonio, Tex., "is the sort of person who should play for John Mackovic — a blind follower."

The Chiefs used their own first-round pick, the fifth overall in this USFL-diluted draft, for Bill Maas, a hulking defensive lineman out of Pittsburgh who will switch to noseguard. Their first-round choice from the Rams, the 21st overall, was used for offensive lineman John Alt, 6-foot-7, 278.

In the second and third rounds, the Chiefs sought help for two of their most beleaguered position-groups, taking Penn State linebacker Scott Radevic and Southern Colorado running back Herman Heard.

Maas, 6-4, 265, is the kind of beefy lineman Mackovic prefers. He will be asked to shore up what has been a weak spot for years.

"He's big and strong and we felt that he adds something to our defensive line that we need," Mackovic said. "We have not been, size-wise, big enough up the middle and I think this can help us quite a bit in that position. He's played against a lot of double-team blocks."

The Chiefs also announced they had traded running back Jewel Thomas to the San Diego Chargers for an undisclosed 1985 draft pick.

Green, a three-time all-pro and a starter since he was drafted in the first round in 1977, said the trade was designed "to unload Gary Green. Mackovic wants only his kind of players — blind followers."

Novice crew team takes 3rd place

The K-State crew team sent five crews to the Midwest Association of Rowing Colleges Championship at Madison, Wis., over the weekend and had mixed success.

Two of the five teams made the finals. The men's novice eight crew captured third place and a bronze medal with a time of 6 minutes and 54.35 seconds. The University of Wisconsin was first with a time of 6:34. The team from the University of Kansas finished second with a time of 6:53.71.

But K-State's previously undefeated men's varsity four crew managed only a fourth-place showing among 16 schools. The squad turned in a time of 7:35.67, while Ohio State University nabbed first place with a time of 7:17.9 and Wisconsin's B and A squads captured second and third with times of 7:27.9 and 7:28.37, respectively.

"In the afternoon the wind was high, and we had difficulty at the start," said Don Rose, K-State coach, in reference to varsity four's finish. "The boat turned sideways, and we were the last to leave."

The next action scheduled for the crew team is the Intercollegiate Rowing National Championships at Syracuse, N.Y.

"While we were disappointed in men's varsity four, we feel they were a fast boat, but the start hurt them," Rose said.

Green

A favorite with fans, media and teammates, Green was an elected team spokesman. The trade will come under particular criticism because of the many USFL signings which thinned the quality of this year's draft.

"From time to time we do things that may or may not be a surprise," Mackovic said. "But certainly I think it was proper at this particular time for us to trade him to the Rams."

Asked if Green was traded because of his "off-field" activities, Mackovic answered, "Not necessarily. I don't think those are the overriding factors. You can never judge any one thing by only one set of circumstances. I'm always looking at the big picture. I don't look at small picture."

Green said Mackovic "unloaded" him because of his position as a team leader.

"He didn't give me a reason for doing it when he called this morning," Green said. "I don't think John feels he has to give a reason for anything he does. It was the same cold manner that he does everything. Very Mackovic-like."

"John wants a team full of blind followers, people who will never question anything he does," Green said. "I'm a very coachable person. Whatever the coach says to do, I do. But I was also elected by my teammates as a team leader, a guy to go to management when the players have something they want to talk about."

Thomas played in 10 games for the Chiefs last year after coming in a trade with Los Angeles that involved quarterback Steve Fuller and cornerback Eric Harris, totaling 115 yards on 44 carries.

Heard, 6-0, 184, surrendered his final year of NAIA eligibility to be drafted. In two years at Southern Colorado he carried 299 times for 1,794 yards and caught 47 passes.

'Huskers go 1-2 in NFL draft

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Nebraska Cornhuskers did something Tuesday that only one college football team ever did before.

With wide receiver Irving Fryar taken by New England and Dean Steinkuhler whisked away by Houston, the Huskers had the first and second players selected in the National Football League draft.

Four Big Eight players were taken in the first round Tuesday and five went in Round two.

Atlanta took Oklahoma lineman Rick Bryan and Miami went for Sooner linebacker Jackie Shipp later in the first round.

In round two, Washington selected Sooner lineman Bob Slater and Atlanta stayed with Sooner talent, picking up defensive back Scott Case and using a supplemental second round choice for linebacker Thomas Benson.

Later in the second round, Cleveland decided upon Oklahoma State defensive back Chris Rockins and Dallas chose Colorado defensive back Victor Scott.

Texaco-Getty merger clouds future of El Dorado refinery

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The future of the Getty Oil Refinery in El Dorado is in jeopardy unless the Federal Trade Commission requires Texaco, Inc., to guarantee a seven-year supply of crude oil to prospective refinery buyers, according to a report released Tuesday by Attorney General Robert Stephan.

The report, compiled by a Houston-based energy consulting, said guarantees of Kansas, west Texas and Oklahoma crude, at posted prices and equal to 1983 volume, are essential to assure "and enhance the viability of the refinery and bolster its chances to be sold as an ongoing business."

The Republican attorney general hired the consulting firm of Wright, Killen and Feldman, Inc., to analyze the refinery situation after Texaco received tentative FTC approval in February to merge with Getty Oil Co.

The commission gave a tentative okay to the $10.1 billion merger on the condition Texaco agrees to sell the Getty refinery in El Dorado — the largest in Kansas — and the pipeline serving it.

Stephan said the report will accompany the state's comments on the FTC consent order, to be filed with the federal commission later this week. In the report, the consultants speculated it will require up to $200 million to buy the refinery and its assets. In addition, funds will be needed to meet normal operating requirements.

"It may be necessary for the buyer to assume a significant long-term debt in acquiring the assets," the report said. "In view of the future threats to crude supply, the absence of crude supply assurances may increase the financial risk to unacceptable levels. Therefore, assurances of supply should exist over a long enough period reflecting the retirement of the debt associated with the purchase of the assets."

State officials have protested the merger because they fear no one will buy the refinery without a guaranteed source of crude oil. Contracts for crude oil which Getty now holds will not transfer to any new owner of the refinery.

"The report confirms the concerns of all of us who have been working to keep the refinery open," Stephan said in a prepared statement. "The FTC consent order does not adequately assure continued viability of the refinery."

"The report contains hard facts for the FTC to consider in arriving at its final order. I'm convinced these facts have not been considered to date by the FTC. When taken into account, it is difficult for me to conceive that the FTC would not be convinced the order demands change."

Since the initial merger announcement, U.S. Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kansas, has secured a commitment from Texaco to be the "crude oil supplier of last resort" to any purchaser of the refinery. The oil company's agreement came in a letter to Dole from Donald Annett, Texaco vice president.

The El Dorado facility has the capacity to refine 80,600 barrels of crude oil a day and provides gasoline to a number of independent service stations, primarily in western Kansas. The refinery employs 525 people.

The report suggests the FTC require Texaco to guarantee:

- Access to Kansas, west Texas and or Oklahoma crude oils of "appropriate quality, at posted prices and in an amount equal to the 1983 volumes run in the El Dorado refinery" for at least seven years.
- To exchange "on an economic equivalent delivered-barrel basis," suitable local crude to the refinery in the event foreign crudes are no longer directly accessible to El Dorado. That might happen with the conversion of the Texoma and Seaway pipelines to natural gas service.

- That two Getty pipelines be included in the list of assets to be divested. The pipelines, which the consultants said are integral to the refinery, connect the El Dorado plant with Conway salt dome storage caverns.
- To sell storage capacity at the salt dome caverns in Conway, or offer a long term lease to the purchaser of the refinery. The storage, in the range of 250,000 or 300,000 barrels, is viewed as necessary to the normal operation of the plant.
- Exclusive rights of the Getty brand name west of the Mississippi and east of the Rocky Mountains.
- A rapid and orderly resolution of the future disposition of the refinery assets.

Author's advice for 'good time after nuclear war' offends some

By The College Press Service

Are college campuses ready for a wave of jokes about what to do after the big bomb drops?

Kit Kiefer, anyway, is betting they are. His recently-published "Post-Nuclear Collegian" addresses the question, "How will you as a collegian be able to have a good time after nuclear war?"

First, Kiefer said, you must survive. His book offers suggestions for building shelters out of the beer cans and discarded pizza boxes scattered around most dormitory rooms. For the more ambitious, there's the shelter made out of beer kegs.

Failing that, Kiefer shows how students can try to repel oncoming Soviet missiles by creating dense sound waves. His recommended method: playing Def Leppard at high volume.

He addresses the questions of what to wear, what classes to take and what extracurricular activities to pursue.

Nuclear war may not seem like obvious fodder for comedy to most people, but when Kiefer got the idea for his book, "it was like the holy city opening up," he said.

Ahead of him he could visualize immediate publication, wealth ("I didn't write it not to make money") and fame — maybe even an appearance on The David Letterman Show.

There were obstacles, however, even for the self-proclaimed "foremost college humorist in America."

Kiefer said he knew there was room on the planet for only one look at campus life after a nuclear holocaust, and he feared someone else might come up with the same idea. So he made a hasty arrangement with Halfcourt Press in Wisconsin.

In some of Kiefer's previous work as a freelancer for the 13-30 Corp., which publishes slick publications like "America" and "Nutshell," he had worked with Berke Breathed, the creator of Bloom County. But Breathed's success put him out of Kiefer's price range, so Kiefer approached an engineering illustrator he knew.

The illustrator missed all his deadlines.

Kiefer, who said he realized early in life he was not cut out to be an artist, decided to try it himself.

He locked himself in his room with a triangle, an engineering scale and a Pilot razor point pen, eventually emerging with illustrations that fail to be surprisingly good.

Despite all that, a year and a half after Kiefer's original flash, the book is now out and the 25-year-old author is waiting for the procession of the world to his door.

"We're selling T-shirts with the 'fall-in shelter' symbol (three Doritos on a paper plate arranged to look like the Civil Defense symbol). And frisbees. And caps. There are all kinds of marketing possibilities," he said.

Which is not to say everyone likes them.

In his promotional treks, Kiefer discovered his vision of post-nuclear college life is not well-received by members of another campus group — the nuclear freeze advocates.

"I'm trying to stay away from those people," Kiefer said. "I've had them pull my signs down."

He said he doesn't have anything against the nuclear freeze movement.

"It's a good idea in theory, but it's unworkable in practice," he said. He also said its proponents tend to take themselves very seriously.

"This isn't a book with a big message. It's just something to laugh at," he said. "We're all going to be living in a nuclear age. All I'm saying is that we don't need to let it get us down. The closest thing to tragedy is humor."

Manson's 'lieutenant' to stay in jail

By The Associated Press

SAN LUIS OBISPO, Calif. — The man who once called himself Charles Manson's "lieutenant for killing" and played a key part in the bloody Tate-La Bianca murders 15 years ago was denied parole Tuesday by state prison officials.

Charles "Tex" Watson, 38, convicted of seven counts of first-degree murder in the 1969 "Manson Family" murders of actress Sharon Tate and six other people, was denied parole by a three-member panel of the state Board of Prison Terms.

Watson told the board he had changed from the man prosecutors said inflicted more than 90 percent of the 156 stab wounds found on the seven victims' bodies.

"I am not the same person I was 15 years ago," he said.

He blamed the murders on Manson's influence over other family members and the "erroneous" beliefs Manson planted in the others.

But Los Angeles County Deputy District Attorney Stephen Kay called

Watson a "cold-blooded killer" who would be a danger to society if released.

Watson repeatedly has been denied parole by state officials who have cited the shocking nature of the crime and psychiatric reports indicating he is still dangerous.

Watson was convicted of seven counts of murder for the slayings of Tate and four others on Aug. 9, 1969, and of grocery executive Leno LaBianca and his wife the following night.

Acker opposes health policy 'discrimination'

By MIKE TURNER
Government Editor

Student health insurance for 1984-1985 will include maternity coverage in the basic plan, according to a ruling issued late Wednesday by K-State President Duane Acker.

"This is not a legal issue, it is a policy issue. We will continue our practice of offering student health insurance, including maternity benefits," Acker said. "It also is consistent with our policy of opposing discrimination in any form."

Acker made reference to the inclusion of maternity benefits in health insurance made available to state employees.

"It also parallels the type of health insurance coverage offered to employees of Kansas State University and the State of Kansas," he said.

Under provisions of the insurance bill passed by Student Senate April 26, the following rates will be implemented by Keystone Insurance for 1984-1985:

— $429 for single students

— $1,017.50 for student/spouse

— $984.50 for student/children

— $1,419 for student/spouse/children

The rates were approved by senate as an alternate plan in case the University decided not to change its policy requiring maternity coverage in the basic health plan. Acker said he was pleased senate passed their proposal with the alternate plan included.

"I commend the Student Senate for formulating the health insurance policy so that when it came to my desk, there were sound options open to review. This speaks to the quality of our student leadership in a very direct and complimentary way," Acker said.

Charles Hein, director of communications, said several factors influenced Acker's decision to include maternity benefits in the basic health plan.

Acker reviewed the University's policy on discrimination, looked at health insurance offered by the state and reviewed health insurance policies offered by other universities, Hein said. Only three other Big Eight schools do not offer maternity coverage in their basic plan. Fort Hays State University is a Kansas university which will begin offering maternity coverage next fall, he said.

"Above all, he just concluded it was right," Hein said.

Health insurance rates without maternity coverage included would have been approximately 10 percent lower in each category. Single students would have paid $390, student/spouse rates would have been $925, student/children rates would have been $895 and student/spouse/children rates would have been $1,290.

Tracy Turner, senate chairman and junior in economics, said he supported Acker's decision. Senate thought the options presented to Acker were the best alternatives and planned to operate whichever way he decided, Turner said.

"It was his decision to make, not ours," he said. "I stand behind it."

Shuttle service charge for temporarily injured may discourage riders

By LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

A user fee for the K-State shuttle service for temporarily handicapped students will be implemented next year, but the prospect of such a fee draws differing reactions.

The user fee was adopted after completion of a task force study on the shuttle. The task force recommended a fee of $1 a day, and estimated such a fee would generate $800 a year. The fee will not affect permanently handicapped students using the shuttle.

Based on this recommendation, the Student Senate Finance Committee recommended Students for Handicapped Concerns receive $2,134.80 for the 1984-1985 school year, an $800 reduction from the amount requested. The committee's recommendation was accepted by senate during tentative allocations.

Gretchen Holden, coordinator of services for physically limited students, said she believed the inconvenience of a fee system would discourage ridership.

"It's just one more problem for that student," she said. "They're already struggling to get around, now they will have to try to get around and get it (the fee) paid. It may be the last straw, and they'll just drop out (of school)."

"K-State students are not a wealthy group. Some students will have trouble paying that (fee)."

Sally Routson, student activities coordinator, said the fee may discourage riders.

"With any type of fee structure, this (discouraging riders) is a possibility," she said. "However, the survey taken by the task force showed the fee is feasible."

The survey of students who have used the service in the past showed 84 percent thought $5 a week would be a reasonable fee. However, 8 percent said they would have been unable to use the service if there had been a user fee.

The user fee is not excessive, said Lori Leu, task force chairman and senior in social sciences.

"Most students using the service are handicapped for less than 3 months," she said. "But the most they would have to pay is $40 a semester, so if they rode for a whole semester they would save $35. It would cost more than that if there were a Manhattan bus service."

The task force recommended the fee be collected at the Student Government Services office in the Union. The students will be issued a receipt showing the number of days they paid to ride. Copies of the receipt and the students' class schedules will then be sent to Holden's office in Holton Hall for ride scheduling.

The task force failed to consider the administrative costs of collecting fees, Holden said.

"The administrative costs include staff time, receipts and publicizing regulations. They (the task force) are hoping to save $800, but it will cost more of my and Jenny's (Jenny Johnson, SGS office secretary) time."

The time required to administer the fee system will be taken from dealing with permanently handicapped students, Holden said.

"I'm here to see that students with permanent disabilities get an education. The temporarily handicapped students are not the top priority," she said.

Arranging for a second car also may be a problem, Holden said.

"We don't always have a second car ready to go," she said. "We may have students who have paid and have no transportation." A student driver must be hired to drive the state car to transport temporarily handicapped students.

There are possible problems with the user fee, but the idea of a fee system is valid, said Chet Peters, vice president for student affairs.

"These students have handicaps from auto accidents, ski trips and intramurals," he said. "The injuries probably won't be of long duration, and out of fairness, they ought to pay part of their own way."

Holden said she would like the shuttle to expand its service in the future.

"I would like to see more Student Senate support for the shuttle," she said. "The shuttle only runs on campus and only on school days. I would like to see it run in the evenings, summers and off campus."

Leu also said shuttle service should be increased, but favors different means of funding.

"There may be some problems to be worked out later, but the fee should be tried," she said. "If it works, maybe we can expand the services, and maybe the shuttle can become self-sufficient."

The fee system will be evaluated after the first year, Routson said.

John Becker, who was born with Down's syndrome, spends free time drawing in his bedroom.

Staff/Hürriyet Aydoğan

By KAREN BELLUS
Staff Writer

The artist's concentration is focused on his work. Instinctively, he selects the next color in his composition of vertical color streaks.

The room he works in is testament to the art he produces. Drawings, wall hangings, mobiles, colored window shades and lampshades abound in the house he shares with his mother, father and younger brother.

Also hanging on the wall are the numerous purple, blue and red award ribbons the 26-year-old mentally retarded man has received for his artwork.

John Becker was born with Down's syndrome, a condition which left him severely mentally retarded. Educationally, he is at best in the early stages of the first grade.

However, a life that could have been a tragic existence of minimal participation has been transformed into a happy, productive one through the love and nurturing of his family.

John's artwork developed in his late teen-age years. Before that, John had no interest in art until he attended a Sunday school class at St. Luke's Lutheran Church.

"Someone sat him down with a crayon and a blank sheet of paper.

At first he would come home with it filled completely with one color. He was just delighted with it," his mother, Georgia Becker, said.

Later, John developed his artwork into what it is today: effective compositions of alternating color streaks. John now works with clothing, watercolor markers, indelible markers, tempera paint and ink pen.

'Diane (Dollar) said this is art, this is good. At first we couldn't believe it. But as time went on, we saw it as art, too.'

Georgia Becker

Georgia said that at first John's family didn't realize his drawings were anything other than scribbles. It wasn't until John participated in an Introduction to the Arts course taught by K-State instructors in the speech, dance and art departments that his "scribbles" were recognized as something much more.

Diane Dollar, instructor in art and a co-instructor of the course, was the first to realize John's talent, Georgia said.

"Diane said this is art, this is good. At first we couldn't believe it. But as time went on, we saw it as art, too. It took an artist to see that what he was doing was art," she said.

Dollar has continued her interest in John's work. She has taught Georgia to buy the art supplies John needs, to mat John's drawings and has suggested new media for John to work in. She also has continued to encourage John to expand his art.

John has used his artwork to decorate skirts, scarves, bedspreads, Christmas cards and postcards.

"We try to find as many practical uses of his art as we can," Georgia said.

Occasionally, John and his family attend arts and crafts festivals where they are able to sell and publicize John's work.

John has continued working and expanding his art. His mother said that John has never had a "dry spell" or period when he was uninterested in drawing.

"In fact, if something happens so that he can't color for a few days, he gets uneasy. I don't think there's even a day he doesn't do something," she said.

John also participates in other activities. He competes in contests sponsored by the Kansas Association of Retarded Citizens (KARC) such as art and speech competitions, the Special Olympics and the KARC rodeo.

John also has participated in many open-class competitions (competitions that are limited to retarded citizens), has received purple, blue and red ribbons in the county fair and has advanced to the top one-third group of finalists in a magazine art contest with more than 300 participants.

John has attended classes at Lee School for the trainable mentally handicapped. Before that, Georgia taught John at home. She had experience teaching elementary school, and this helped her teach John at home, she said. He still has lessons every day.

Computers aid class, hasten experiments

By LILLIAN ZIER
Collegian Reporter

Three years ago, John Uhlarik, professor of psychology, and Jerry Frieman, associate professor of psychology, wrote to the National Science Foundation for ways to improve undergraduate science instruction, and their efforts paid off.

This semester the Experimental Methods in Psychology class is performing experiments on 10 microcomputers and three printers. With the computer equipment, students are able to do more experiments in greater detail each semester.

The computers are used in experiments in which a subject sits down, the computer presents a word and the subject types his or her reaction into the computer.

For example, in an experiment on subliminal perception, the computer flashes a word onto the screen and the subject identifies the word. The computer measures the behavioral patterns of the subject, Uhlarik said.

The computers also are used to analyze data.

"They work like high-tech calculators," Uhlarik said. "You can enter the data and get fairly sophisticated statistical analyses with them."

Students learn to think both in terms of the experimenter and of the experiment's subject. An experiment is first demonstrated on the students, then they are asked to design their own experiments examining the subject more closely.

A second type of experiment the students participate in is about extrasensory perception (ESP). The students are presented with a metal plate, half of which is polished aluminum and half of which is painted black.

The lab instructor tells the students he has ESP, then is blindfolded and correctly judges which half of the metal plate is black. The students think of explanations for the ESP, Uhlarik said.

Another type of experiment deals with crowding behavior. Subjects are placed in a room with different variables and asked to rate how crowded they feel. Some subjects are placed in a warmer room, some are placed in a different-colored room, some are placed in a room with more people. The students share results of their experiments to develop conclusions.

"The whole emphasis from our point of view is to learn how to design experiments," Uhlarik said.

"This gives you the feel of what it's like to really investigate something," Frieman said.

"They make all the same mistakes that we make. They design dumb experiments — that's an experiment where they get the results and say 'that's obvious, why did I have to spend all that time doing it?'"

The final type of experiment the students work with also is the most common type used — surveys. Students learn to choose items to put on the survey, then choose a topic of their own for an attitude survey. Students this year have chosen topics for their surveys such as abortion, religious attitudes and nuclear disarmament.

Local judge to attend DUI conference

By TONA TURNER
Collegian Reporter

When the Municipal Judges Association meets June 6-9 in Wichita to discuss several controversial topics, especially the driving under intoxication laws, Manhattan Municipal Court Judge Pat Caffey will be there.

Current DUI laws provide for a mandatory 48-hour jail sentence and a fine. Some offenders, however, are placed on diversion rather than being convicted.

Diversion laws state that judges must enforce such portions of the DUI statute as an $85 fee for alcohol education classes and the cost of the classes themselves. The classes are mandatory for all diversion cases and are usually more expensive than DUI fines. The offense is not reported on the offender's record as DUI, but is noted in court records.

There were 180 reported DUI cases in Manhattan during 1983, Caffey said. Of these cases, 127 were dismissed on diversion, 40 were convictions, 10 were dismissed by the prosecution, one was amended to another charge, one person was found innocent and one individual failed to appear in court, he said.

Of the convictions, 26 were first-time offenses and 14 were second-time offenses, he said.

Caffey said the decision of whether or not the offender receives diversion is "completely in control of the prosecutor."

"Judges don't have any say," Caffey said. "However, I think you have to grant diversion out of a practical matter to keep from being backlogged."

City Prosecutor Robert Pottroff said diversion is based on the "three strike rule." The first strike is determined by the individual's driving record. If the driving record is bad, it usually means strike one.

The second strike refers to other records of the individual, including character references, Pottroff said. The third strike refers to previous DUI convictions. If the individual has received a DUI conviction prior to the acting conviction, he usually receives the third strike and isn't dismissed on diversion. The offender must then serve the mandatory jail sentence and pay the fine.

Caffey said he is in favor of increasing the number of diversion cases.

Some cities have raised concerns about whether they should repeal DUI ordinances to force the counties to pay for prosecution.

One such city which repealed its ordinance is Rose Hill in southwestern Butler County. Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephan ruled that the county had to pay for prosecution.

"I don't see any reason to do that," Caffey said. "The revenue cities take in by ticket fines cover the salaries of the prosecutor and officers."

Caffey said the county courts would be overloaded if they had to handle more DUI cases.

The judges association has proposed several changes to the current DUI laws.

Caffey said there are several inconsistencies in the laws.

"I suspect there will be no changes from the legislature, though," he said.

Staff/Scott Morrissey

Manhattan Municipal Court Judge Pat Caffey and other Manhattan judges hear an average of 18 drunken driving cases per month.

Poll shows students support Reagan

By KARRA PORTER
Staff Writer

The Collegian Editorial Board surveyed students this week to gauge campus opinion of this year's presidential candidates.

Two hundred students were selected from the Campus Directory in a simple random sample and asked about candidate preferences, reasons for supporting a particular candidate and the major issue in the 1984 presidential campaign.

After subtracting wrong numbers called and students who were not home when called, the actual sample size was 189 students. This provides the survey with approximately 93 percent confidence, which means in 95 of every 100 similar samples, the results would match within seven percentage points either way.

Slightly more than half the sample, 98 students, were male, and 91 female. Seventy-two were between 17 and 20 years old, 77 were 21-24 and 40 were over 25.

Of 108 registered voters, 34 were

Democrats, 24 independents, 49 Republicans and one classified as "other." Of the students not registered, 19 said they consider themselves Democrats, 15 independents, 38 Republicans and five "others."

The results indicate overwhelming support for Ronald Reagan among K-State students, by a margin of almost two to one over the runner-up, Gary Hart. Of the respondents, 97 said they preferred Reagan over all other candidates. Hart was favored by 53 respondents, 20 favored Walter Mondale, three chose Jesse Jackson, seven were undecided and one supported 1980 presidential candidate John Anderson.

Most supporters of Reagan cited his incumbency as the primary reason for their support. The overall sentiment was that Reagan's past performance in office warranted another four-year term.

Many of the respondents said they didn't know exactly why they support Reagan. Some cited the president's accomplishments in stabilizing the economy and his "tough" leadership role as reasons for their support.

Respondents were presented with three election scenarios and asked to decide whom they would vote for if Ronald Reagan were challenged in turn by Hart, Mondale and Jackson.

Overall, respondents were 64 percent as likely to vote for Hart as Reagan. Jackson was chosen over Reagan by only 17 percent of the respondents and Mondale was preferred over Reagan by 27 percent of the students surveyed.

A consistent pattern emerged from the results. The older the respondent, the less likely he was to support Reagan. Hart was the favorite Democratic challenger in all age groups, especially with women, and Jackson was the least favored.

Of both men and women aged 17-20, Reagan was the clear choice over all three Democratic candidates. Women in this age group, however, were almost three times more likely than men to vote for a Democratic candidate. The men indicated a preference for Reagan over a Democrat 87 percent of the time.

Reagan also won substantially in the 21-24 age bracket, and again women were more likely than men to choose a Democratic candidate. Men between 21 and 24 were much less likely to vote for Jackson over Reagan than any other category.

The gender gap, the decreasing support for Reagan among women voters, was even more apparent among the 25 and older group. Women in that category were nearly two and a half times more likely to vote for Hart than Reagan and, with the exception of Jackson, preferred a Democratic candidate over Reagan. Women in this age group, however, were still much more likely to vote for Jackson over Reagan than students in any other category.

Men over 25 still favored Reagan, but said they would be willing to vote for a Democratic candidate slightly less than half the time.

Acker's decision commendable

K-State President Duane Acker's decision to overturn Student Senate's recommendation to exclude maternity coverage from the student health insurance program comes as a last-minute reassurance that discrimination will not be tolerated at this University.

Arguments in favor of taking maternity benefits out of the student health insurance policy included economics (the reduced benefits would reduce the premiums to students) and the fact that three other Big Eight Conference schools have maternity coverage as a rider.

The fact remains that discrimination must be fought in all forms, regardless of its possible benefits to some, before equality for all can truly be achieved.

Acker recognized this fact in overruling senate's recommendation. An institution of learning should include a "real-world" education in which discrimination is not openly condoned and promoted.

Unfortunately, senate's actions in this matter demonstrated that women still have a long fight ahead of them for equal treatment.

Peters leaves legacy of concern

Sometimes the distance between Anderson Hall and the rest of the campus seems insurmountable. But at least one K-State administrator has, for many students, bridged that gap.

Chet Peters, vice president for student affairs, will retire after the 1984-1985 academic year.

Too often students feel like just another number, but Peters has a talent for making them feel like individuals. He always seems to be interested in student concerns. Rather than being isolated in Anderson's ivory tower, he is involved with student committees and organizations.

When Peters retires, he will leave a legacy of good will between students and administration. Although no one can replace him, he will leave an example for others to follow.

Academics suffer slow erosion

The day the parents of a prospective student from New York parked their car in a reserved stall and subsequently found their car had been towed, few suspected that changes in parking policies would follow so rapidly, despite the wrath they released upon the University president and vice president.

They had, after all, broken the law — at least as the incident was explained to me — and they would leave Kansas angry but aware that we enforce our laws equally.

In the years that I have been on this campus, I have felt that K-State Police Department officers enforce the campus regulations with moderation. The policy on towing has been that no one is towed from a reserved stall unless the stall "owner" requests that that be done.

It has always appeared to me to be the ultimate in arrogance to park in someone's reserved space. That act is a statement that you don't know who it is you have offended. Abe Lincoln's statement on being unable to please all of the people all of the time certainly applies in the case of eliminating towing, but I would like to add a thought that I doubt would offend Honest Abe.

Although it is not possible to please all people, an attempt should be made to be just to all people. Is it just for a person who has a reserved space, perhaps with a medical disorder, to walk across campus or perhaps be late for work because of the inconsideration of another?

The thing that keeps me — and maybe even New Yorkers — from parking in a reserved space when pressed by time or inconvenience is the threat of embarrassment of being towed.

In fact, I don't care who is or is not towed, since I don't park in reserved spaces. What really pierces me to the heart is the realization that when I, a member of the K-State "family," complain to the president and numerous other administrators, not the slightest ripple passes through the halls of Anderson, but when someone from the Big Apple complains, policies come tumbling down.

I wish someone in Anderson Hall would pay my parking tickets! As evidence of the truth of my claim, I wish to do something that under other conditions I would consider inappropriate. I wish to share with you a letter which I sent to K-State President Duane Acker on Feb. 25, 1984.

Had it not been for the fact that I received no response to my letter — other than a few "attaboys" from a couple of equally helpless colleagues — I don't think I would care to share it with you. As you read it, bear in mind that it was written just after noon on the day K-State hosted the University of Kansas basketball team, with a tip-off time of 7:10 p.m.

WILLIAM DAWES
Guest Columnist

Dear President Acker,

At a recent scholarship luncheon, I listened with admiration to your description of the depth and breadth of the academic opportunities offered by the K-State faculty. I left that memorable gathering proud of my daughter's achievements and with a rekindled appreciation of the small part I play in the academic mission of this renowned University.

Although your words were addressed to the opportunities offered by our institution, it also was an inspiration to all of the faculty within hearing range to reach a little deeper to give a full measure of excellence in the classroom and laboratory.

Confident that I am doing my part as one of your faculty members, I would like to share a few thoughts with you concerning an area where this great mission of ours may be eroding. I make no requests to you other than to consider what I have to say with a spirit of fairness, as I know you will.

At noon today, I was refused access to the roadway to the parking lot behind my office in Seaton Hall. Upon inquiry as to why I was being denied the privilege to park my car in this particular lot, I was informed that it was because of the important basketball event some 7½ hours later in the day.

Pointing out that surely my $40 parking sticker granted me the right to park in this lot, I was informed that the people who would be parking in the lots behind Seaton Hall had given $3,000 for that right, and that, furthermore, they were important alumni.

As I stared at the attendant, who was chewing tobacco and wearing faded blue jeans, images left behind from your speech began to fade, and suddenly it struck me — THIS WAS SILO TECH, and I had just met one of its ambassadors!

My selfish, but unspoken reaction was that I am an alumnus of K-State three times over, and my professional background would allow me to almost double my salary elsewhere if I chose to desert my position here, making my equivalent contribution probably more than the person who would park in the spot at 7 p.m. that evening that I needed to park in that noon.

Upon parking my car in the Union parking lot, I inquired at the Traffic and Security office as to why I could not park in the lot behind my office. The officer in charge informed me that his department did not care if I parked behind Seaton Hall, but that my difficulty arose from being denied access to the street to that lot, an access controlled by the Athletic Department, not the K-State Police.

Here are the thoughts that I wish to share with you. From time to time, most faculty members — at least in the College of Engineering — encounter employment opportunities at other educational institutions and private industries that would enhance their stature and income.

Many factors play important roles in the personal decision as to whether or not to pursue these opportunities. In the balance, the perception that some faculty rights are being sold as privileges to others may be just the straw to push the decision in the favor of leaving K-State.

I would never slight the importance of the donations made to the University by so many generous alumni and friends, but the strong implication that my contribution is anything less focuses new light on the true mission of our University, where academic excellence is relegated to an important, but lesser role than athletics.

So now, I pick up some ungraded examinations and electronic equipment from my office this beautiful Saturday to walk to the parking lot behind the Union — a walk that will not hurt me — to return home, eat lunch and grade those exam papers in time to attend the K-State vs. KU basketball game this evening — the 19th consecutive competition between these institutions that I shall have witnessed in Ahearn.

But the lustre may be diminished this time for me. Will the game I watch tonight represent a creeping danger? Are we witnessing an erosion of our promise to academic purpose?

Will I someday answer the temptation to leave K-State with an affirmative response? Are there other, good, dedicated educators who, after getting a glimpse of some of the true facets of K-State, move on with a heavy heart, leaving behind unfulfilled goals and a decaying beloved friend for whom the prognosis leaves fading hope?

William H. Dawes assistant professor of engineering technology

P.S. A check of the area behind Seaton Hall shortly after 3 p.m. clearly indicates that restrictions placed on the faculty are not because of the women's game, which is now in progress, since this area is virtually empty.

Day-care plan offers alternative

Student-parents: we've all been reading about the limited day care facilities at K-State and how student government has cut all funding, even though many students pay out-of-state fees.

Fifteen percent of the student body consists of married couples, many who have pre-school children. Students now can help establish a full-time and part-time on-campus day care facility which can help meet their child-care needs.

I've had the pleasure of talking to Beverly Briggs, assistant professor of family and child development, Marjorie Stith, professor of family and child development and Laverne Lindsey, assistant provost for the Division of Continuing Education, and learned there is a movement under way to establish a program to fit parents' child-care needs, but students must write and make those needs known!

I pay $45 to $54 a week for day-care at an off-campus facility and end up leaving my son from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., with no time for daytime contact.

Lindsey is heading a special task force to find out what students' needs are, but she requires supporting letters from interested parents.

JOHN MARKIEWICZ
Guest Columnist

The questions she needs answered in these letters are:

— What days and times do you require day-care? (evenings?)

— How old are your children?

— Would you participate in a co-op program (parents working 4-5 hours per week)?

— What can you financially afford? (Many parents realize the social growth potential for young children interacting with their peers, but cannot afford what commercial centers charge.)

— What activities would you like to see included?

— What special needs do your children require?

— Why would you like to see a center on campus?

It's hard for a university to justify competing with local business. As far as I am concerned, it's my money, I want to keep it on campus and I prefer on-campus facilities.

One "sore" spot with commercial centers also should be remembered — holidays and school breaks. Students still must pay for their child's "place," even though they are out of town. An on-campus facility would be more flexible.

I feel an on-campus center would benefit students, faculty and staff, in that, as parents, some daytime contact would not only enhance our children's growth, but also help us parents learn from each other and the professionals here at K-State. The center I currently take my child to is now hiring a May 1984 graduate from this campus.

If you are interested in on-campus child-care, please contact Lindsey at 301 Umberger Hall, 532-5644, and talk to her. Be sure to support her with something in writing.

(Editor's note: John Markiewicz is a junior in construction science.)

Washington is a world apart

WASHINGTON — It wasn't the real world. But for a short time, it was mine.

Insulated from the common man and the filth bred by industry, annexed from Kansas' endless plains, life was heady, intense and thrilling.

Following Tip O'Neill down the hall of the Capitol one day, attending the joint session of Congress for Francois Mitterand the next, meeting Eric Sevareid the following — excitement was continuous, typically Washingtonian and removed from the rest of the country and even the rest of the world.

Washington is a clean city. "We don't make cars here, we don't make steel beams, we talk," is the way one journalist described the capital's atmosphere. The No. 1 industry is government; the second is tourism.

As for Capitol Hill, this is a world unto itself in a city already unto itself.

The rest of the world, including Washington, doesn't hold two college degrees — often from private or at least prestigious schools. The rest of the world doesn't read The Washington Post, The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times for breakfast — and understand

NANCY MALIR
Washington Correspondent

what's being read.

Most of us don't have the opportunity to walk back and forth through the Capitol building daily, stop for lunch at the American Cafe, attend the National Symphony in the evening, tour the Smithsonian buildings on Saturday and hike along the Chesapeake and Ohio canals past the exclusive shops of Georgetown on Sunday. Or if you won't see your parents (financial consultants) for three months, there's no need to go past the shops.

Where else can you pass the White House as you cruise the downtown on Saturday evening, or dance till 2 a.m. in the shadow of the Capitol?

How many other office employees in the country work to the sound of bells ringing for a floor vote, or the voice of the majority whip announcing the day's business, or ride the elevator with Congressmen with recognizable faces but hard-to-recall names, or be allowed into the tiny room where the Rules Committee meets, to see Claude Pepper and Trent Lott, all because you have a staffers badge and waited in line in hour.

It's not hard to understand how a Congressman could lose touch, or at least grow impatient, with the masses of his constituency back home. The educated elitism of Hill employees, the glamour of the city, the intoxication of the social life, the wealth of the populous — the rest of the world is not upper-crust, wealthy, well-educated or informed.

It's easy to lose touch, and for me, it was desirable to blanket myself in the warmth of others who think like I do and desire to go where I am heading. For the members of Congress caught between two worlds, life must be almost perpetually frustrating.

For me, it was fulfillment of a fantasy.

Student Senate ignores political lessons

Editor,

Thomas Jefferson maintained that the highest function of a university is to be critical of the current policies in a society. K-State's Student Senate, apparently having evolved to a state of wisdom far beyond that of Jefferson, maintains otherwise. When it chose not to help fund the Coalition for Human Rights, it acted as if being critical of society is inappropriate as a central function of a university.

The reasons I have read or heard given for this action strike me as shallow, incoherent and evident of lack of good faith in trying to work with an organization that is currently the major educational force around here on the subject of Central America.

I have heard the suggestion that the coalition invite "more speakers from the other side." Does senate wish to be in the business of surveying and evaluating proposed speakers to see that they are really on "the other side," whatever that means? Would it be able to determine this without being itself "political" in some way?

Who will keep surveillance over the senate's hidden political persuasions that might motivate its members' decisions? Will it simply take a vote on whether it thinks a speaker is "left" or "right"? Will it require a student group that is, say, opposed to rape (or at least its individual members are opposed to rape), to invite a speaker from "the other side," perhaps a rapist?

Will it keep such surveillance not only over speakers, but also over the political persuasions of an organization's members? And does it seriously believe that advocacy of international human rights can be separated from the political?

The senate needs to distinguish between organizations that are critical of policy and organizations working for a political candidate. The former, if Jefferson is right, should be given the most support of all organizations.

Senate needs to stay out of the business of attempting to create some benign surveillance over individual or collective political leanings of a group. If those leanings happen to motivate some group to do the hard work of getting speakers for some crucial topic, so be it.

If a group of students with different politics is sufficiently motivated to bring speakers of "the other side," that is the only legitimate way to achieve "balance." Of course, a right-wing group need not do that here if they would wish to maintain the status quo and blind support of current policy. Senate will do it for them, in the most effective way, as long as it believes it is above politics.

In their surveillance, they would neutralize the strong, critical beliefs that oppose the status quo. Senate is hostile to the spirit of Jefferson, and they serve certain political forces.

Loss of freedoms evident in this country

Editor,

I am writing this letter as a warning to all people and in the hope that those now in immediate danger may be helped.

What I am talking about is Public Law 93-531, a law that our government has passed that has grave implications for free people everywhere and the future of our nation as a bastion of justice and freedom.

P.L. 93-531 was passed in 1976 and mandates the forced removal of nearly 10,000 self-sufficient farmers and sheep-herders from land they have lived on for centuries. This law will make these people move into government tract houses and will make them wards of the state. This is happening right now in America, not Russia.

The people this law affects immediately are the Navajo Indians of the Big Mountain reservation in Arizona. But it is vitally important for all of us to realize that the same forces, political, social and economic, which are working to destroy these people will also destroy others.

Our government in our name is breaking valid treaties and has set non-elected officials over the Big Mountain Navajo nation to make their decisions for them. This is government without representation, one of things our nation's revolution was fought over.

P.L. 93-531 makes a mockery of all our religious and political ideals. This is only a short list of the crimes and injustices that are being perpetrated against these people in our names.

If we are not to make a sham of the ideals our nation was founded on and that we hold out to the world as an example to follow, the P.L. 93-531 must be repealed. I can hear the Russians saying, "So what if we invade Afghanistan? Look what you do to your own people."

I urge you to please contact me for more information. Either leave a note at 532-5582 or call 532-3299 in the evenings.

Civic awareness necessary to combat rape

Editor,
If you don't know any of the facts about rape, here's four of them:
— 1 in 4 women will be raped in her lifetime.
— Rape is a crime of violence and control.
— Almost half of all rapes happen in the victim's home.
— Rape can happen to anyone between the ages of 3 to 83.

What's the solution to stopping rape? The answer — to become informed. The Community Coalition Against Rape, sponsored in part by Alpha Kappa Lambda, has information on how you can take action to prevent rape from happening to you. Just go to the first floor of the K-State Union between 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. May 7-9. A table is set up next to the stairroom exit.
We have whistles available with this information for a $2 donation. We make no money off the whistles or pamphlets. All the money goes to cover the costs of manufacturing.

If you, or a group you are involved with, would like to become involved to help stop rape, please come talk to us. We can give you information to help. The ultimate goal of this project is community involvement to help prevent rape.

Policy bias

Editor,
Re: Kecia Stolfus' editorial, "Policy pits cost vs. principle," in the April 30 Collegian, and Theresa Russell-Loretz's letter, "Maternity cut indicative of senate's bias," in the May 1 Collegian:

According to these two individuals, Student Senate has disgraced the University and wronged the entire female population by allowing the student health insurance policy to exclude automatic insurance coverage.

The reasoning behind the alleged bias lies in the fact that a "select population" must "pay an additional $400 for this coverage, thus increasing the cost of attending school." This is as it should be. Those who become pregnant should be liable for the cost incurred, not the entire student body. It would be discriminatory to force males to automatically purchase an insurance that as an individual they could never collect on.

Students who plan on having children while in college must be willing to sacrifice. If they cannot pay the cost of bringing a child into the world and adequately caring for it, then they have no business in doing so. The commitments and responsibility lie between the parents and the child, not between the student population and the child. The University is not a maternity ward, but an educational institution.

Political treatment differs

Editor,
Re: Brett Lambert's letter, "ASK has value as student legislative lobby," in the May 2 Collegian:

Brett, you have been spending too much time in Topeka and not enough time learning to read. Nowhere in my letter did I accuse the Associated Students of Kansas of being either worthless or wasteful. What I did say was that ASK is a political group being funded by Student Senate. This is in contradiction to the present supposed policy of that august body.

I realize Lambert probably has a future in politics planned and a position such as campus director of ASK is essential to catapult him into the political elite of this state. I can understand, therefore, why he would become so concerned over the prospect of loss of funding for ASK. I would like to apologize for causing him so much fear.

I will not, however, apologize for insisting that all contradictions in senate policy must be cleared up. If ASK is to be funded, fine. I'm all for it. But only if non-political groups such as the Coalition for Human Rights are funded first. After all, that is the policy of senate, isn't it?

Fraternity violates ordinance

Editor,
Phi Kappa Theta Fraternity House Corp. sold their parking lot, and now the fraternity cars are parked on the city streets around the house. A 12-unit apartment building is going up on the one-time parking lot. This makes our residential neighborhood congested and impedes traffic on Lee Street, Hunting Avenue and College Heights Road near Lee School.

Paul Tidman, current Phi Kappa Theta house president, said the private sale took place a few years ago by the house corporation. Since then, house members have been parking on the lot, which no longer belongs to them. He estimates current house residency to be 50 men with 60 percent driving cars.

City Planner Larry Hulse said he is looking into the matter. He said there is a 1969 ordinance requiring fraternities and sororities to provide off-street parking for 75 percent of their occupancy.

What are you going to do about this, Phi Kappa Theta?

Residence hall life helps new students

Editor,
A Department of Housing rule requires all freshman students to reside in some type of on-campus housing for their first year. I believe if this rule were to be modified, several vacancies in residence halls would be filled.

The second semester of the 1983-1984 school year has given the housing department a need to recruit more students to fill University housing facilities. Currently residence halls are filled to about 85 percent capacity.

Freshmen only contribute to 9.8 percent of K-State's total student population, and if housing officials would change the rule, it would be a start to increasing the number of hall residents. The housing department could rewrite this rule to include all transfer and first-year students not exceeding a certain age.

I propose that the modified rule state, "All incoming freshmen, transfer and first-year students not exceeding a certain age shall be required to live in some type of housing provided by K-State."

Certainly there must be some exceptions made to this rule. Our housing officials are intelligent and responsible enough to make these exceptions. Fraternities and sororities are already exceptions. These organizations play an important role with freshmen and transfer students. They can help make a student's life a little less complicated here at K-State.

I was a junior college transfer student. Coming to K-State for the first year can be quite a transition. Living in a hall would lessen the complications. Also, a student would be relieved of responsibilities such as cooking and cleaning. This means more time for what a student is here for: education.

This is the first semester the housing department has not met its quota to fill the halls. Why not modify the "silent rule" as I have proposed? There would be less of a chance of further problems of filling the halls. This also would enable other transfer students to make the transition as I have, slowly but surely.

Foreign instructors difficult to understand

Editor,
There is a rising number of complaints about teachers on campus who have a difficult time communicating to students. These teachers, who are of different nationalities, do not speak English clearly enough for most students to understand them.

I have personally experienced this problem in chemistry lab and calculus recitation, and other students have expressed their conflicts in physics labs and recitations. Many students are forced to pursue outside help in classes where the teacher lacks communication skills. Other students drop these classes, which usually puts that person a semester behind in his curriculum.

I have talked to several students about this problem, and many have remarked that even asking a question in class is pointless because it is not possible to understand the answer.

It is the teacher's responsibility to communicate to the students, and it is the students' responsibility to inform the teacher that he or she is difficult to understand. Students are here to learn, and asking questions is a part of learning. The teacher must be able to communicate clearly with the students.

I talked to one student who went to an algebra help session. As he arrived, he noticed that each of the "helpers" were of a different nationality. As he began asking questions, he was not able to understand the answers, so he had to leave the help session without getting anything accomplished. The student needed help in algebra and was literally deprived of it because he was unable to understand the helpers.

Something must be done about this problem on campus. Maybe the students should unify and speak out about this issue. Possibly the problem lies in the screening of the teachers as they apply for a job at K-State. The problem must be resolved so that in the future, students may be able to better understand their teachers.

Faculty to meet about contract proposal

Editor,
I am a tenured faculty member, but it is unclear today whether I shall be at K-State in the fall. There is a quiet conspiracy afoot.

By order of the Board of Regents, tenured faculty will be offered a non-negotiable contract in June. Even at this moment, the form of this contract is undecided. A tenured faculty member who refuses to sign his contract will be removed from the payroll.

This is not a hoax. Ask any department head.

Some of us who are aware of what is transpiring will meet at 3:30 p.m. Thursday in Union 212 to discuss our options. I encourage tenured faculty to attend.

Want To Sell Your Books ?

Question: How does the Union Bookstore determine how much your books are worth when you sell them back?

Answer: If the Bookstore has notification from the instructor that the books are to be re-adopted for use the next semester, and if the Bookstore does not already have a sufficient stock on hand, then you will be offered 60% of the publisher's current list price.

For example: If a book sells for $10 new and it meets the requirements noted above, the book would be bought from you for $6.

If the Bookstore has not received notice that the book will be used again, or if it already has a sufficient stock on hand, the book would be worth the current wholesale price as indicated by one of the nation's largest jobbers of used textbooks.

If you have any questions about the price being paid for a textbook, the buyer will be happy to answer any questions which you may have regarding the price paid.

Question: Is 60% the usual price paid for textbooks around the country?

Answer: Definitely not. Most stores in the United States pay only 50% for books being used again. The Union Bookstore is one of the few stores which pays 60%. And remember, we pay cash. You don't have to take your money out in trade.

Question: What about paperbacks? Does the 60% policy apply to them too?

Answer: Yes. The Union Bookstore does not penalize you on paperbacks. If they are being used again, and if the bookstore needs them, you will receive 60% of the publisher's list price.

Question: If the publisher's price has gone up since I bought my books, will I receive the benefit of that price increase?

Answer: Yes. For instance, if you bought your book for $9 and the publisher's list price is now $10, you will get $6, not $5.40.

'Miracle' turns into embarrassment

LONDON — A Roman Catholic doctor on a visit to the Vatican astonished nuns and other pilgrims when he climbed out of a wheelchair after being blessed by Pope John Paul II, he said Wednesday.

"I heard someone say, 'It must be a miracle,' but it wasn't — only an embarrassment," said Dr. Jan Lavric, an able-bodied general practitioner from Yorkshire in northern England.

Lavric said he went to Rome with a group of disabled people last month. After he sat down in the wheelchair, the only seat left in the Vatican's audience chamber, a Swiss guard unexpectedly began wheeling him forward.

"I tried to stop him, but he told me, 'Don't exert yourself.' What would you do? I couldn't jump up and run away, that would have made things worse," he said.

After he kissed the pope's hand and was wheeled away by the guard, he stood up and folded the chair and carried it off. "I must say they were all very surprised," Lavric said.

City to choose new song at party

SAN FRANCISCO — San Franciscans have been invited to City Hall today to drink, dance and sing their vote for the city's song: "San Francisco" or "I Left My Heart In San Francisco."

The merriment under the City Hall rotunda will follow a formal supervisors' committee hearing on a measure by Supervisor Quentin Kopp to change the official tune from "Heart" to "San Francisco."

Citizens will be encouraged to sing, dance and guzzle drinks for 50 cents apiece — the price of a swig in 1936, the year of the Clark Gable-Jeanette MacDonald earthquake musical "San Francisco" that originated the song of the same name.

Woman 'bags' honor in contest

NEW YORK — In this competitive society now emerges the World Champion Grocery Bagger.

In a contest staged to show off the advantages of the paper bag Tuesday, legions of grocery clerks, reporters and confused supermarket customers looked on as 21-year-old Cheryl King of Jersey City, N.J., was proclaimed the best bagger of the bunch.

She won the honor — and $500 — by beating 24 competitors in the All-American Paper Grocery Sack-Off.

Two share $100,000 Onassis prize

WASHINGTON — The retiring secretary of the Smithsonian Institution and an Italian archaeologist will share the $100,000 Olympia prize of a foundation created by the late Greek shipping tycoon Aristotle Onassis.

S. Dillon Ripley of the Smithsonian will receive the award May 9 in Athens from Greek President Constantine Karamanlis. He was cited for his achievements in conservation, ornithology and two decades of managing "an internationally unique institution."

The co-winner of the prize, established in 1979 to honor notable contributions in preserving nature or safeguarding a cultural heritage, is Francesco Nicosia, director of an archaeological center in Tuscany, Italy. He was involved in the restoration of flood-damaged art treasures in Florence, Italy.

Crafts to be taught at Folklife Festival

By BECKY WILEY
Collegian Reporter

Learn how to make a broom or find water with a forked stick; these occupational skills and many others will be taught not at a witches' convention, but at the sixth annual Kansas Folklife Festival at Manhattan's CCo Park on Saturday and Sunday.

Besides occupational skills, the festival will include folk art displays and demonstrations, performing musicians, food booths and demonstrations, activities for children and an auction featuring items donated by Kansas artists and local merchants.

The purpose of the festival is to share and pass skills from one generation to another, said Carol Smith, conference coordinator in the conference office of the K-State Division of Continuing Education and festival coordinator.

"The festival appeals to all ages. It attracts a lot of older people who demonstrate or knew how to do the crafts when they were young. It appeals to younger people who never learned how to quilt. It attracts families because parents want their children to learn things that they knew or their parents knew but didn't carry on," Smith said.

"We (Division of Continuing Education) sponsor the festival because it's an important educational event, and it helps K-State fulfill part of its land-grant mission," she said.

Smith said one of the most popular occupational skills to be exhibited is sheep shearing. Jim Mengarelli, from Girard, will shear sheep provided by the University using the traditional method with no electric tools. Currently he can shear a sheep in three to seven minutes.

The Strawberry Hill Folk Ensemble from Kansas City, Kan., will provide part of the musical talent for the festival. Formed in 1978, these singers and dancers perform music native to the Croatian province in Yugoslavia. The songs tell the story of the lives of the Croatian people. Jazz and bluegrass tunes will be performed at the festival, as well as square dance and black spiritual music. Western music will be provided by "Cowboy Jack" Allison, a performer who once made his living by singing on radio shows. A Swedish quartet and a band performing Volga-German music also will entertain.

The art of making corn dollies, braided rugs and Indian flutes will be among the 20 folk art demonstrations at the festival.

Louella Allen, a Cherokee Indian from Wichita, will demonstrate the art of making ojes at one of the craft booths. An oje is a work with yarn and string woven through sticks of wood. Representing God's eyes and considered to be good luck, American Indians use them in ceremonies such as weddings and other occasions.

Smith said nothing new has been added to the festival itself since last year, but a few areas have been expanded. The children's petting zoo, which includes Elsie, the festival cow, food booths and occupational skills have all grown.

"The festival isn't different, but the people and the crafts are. Everybody in the festival has to be from Kansas, though," Smith said. Smith said the festival can be educational or just an entertaining weekend.

Disk Golf

an escape from homework

Wisbey celebrates a good throw on one of the more difficult holes on the course.

It began more than 30 years ago with the innocent hurling of tin pie plates from the old Frisbee Baking Co. in Bridgeport, Conn.

The sport of Frisbee continues to expand and become more popular as more games are introduced for playing with the flat plastic discs, according to some K-State Frisbee enthusiasts.

Frisbee golf and ultimate Frisbee are just two of the many types of Frisbee games. Others include freestyle, maximum-time loft and guts.

Frisbee golf, also known as disc golf, has been a favorite of K-State Frisbee players this year.

The sport has gained recognition for its versatility as a seasonal sport, and for some students it's a means of escaping from homework.

"It's a good quick release from studying, and it's good practice for playing ultimate Frisbee," John Steeves, senior in biology, said, referring to Frisbee golf.

For some, Frisbee golf is an easy leisure activity. Kirk Barrett, graduate in computer science, said disc golf is a more easygoing form of recreation compared to the fast pace of playing ultimate Frisbee.

"There are about 50 disc golf players around campus, and about 30 of those are dedicated to the sport," Mike Boisvert, junior in fisheries and wildlife biology, said.

In addition to being a versatile leisure activity, disc golf also is considered relatively inexpensive and an easy sport to learn.

"There are a variety of different golf discs, and the cost is anywhere from $5 to $9," Boisvert said.

The other costs of the sport depend on the amount of time a player has available to play and the amount of walking he wants to do.

Disc golf is similar to the regular game of golf, and the rules and methods for playing the game are nearly identical.

There are 18 holes on a disc golf course, but instead of a ball into a hole, the players shoot for trees, signs and various objects. In some national tournaments which are played on golf courses, disc throwers aim for the green where a basket is on top of a pole.

The Aerial Wizards of K-State established an 18-hole disc golf course about four years ago that spreads across campus.

Beginning Frisbee players say they find the sport of disc golf exciting.

"I began playing six months ago, when I bought my first golf disc. Then my interest grew like a weed," Scott Millard, junior in secondary education, said.

Other popular Frisbee events include freestyle and maximum time loft.

In freestyle Frisbee, players perform tricks such as pop-ups, back-spins and catching the disc under the legs.

Maximum-time loft is played when a player throws the disc into the wind, chases the Frisbee and retrieves it with one hand. The world record is about 17 seconds, Boisvert said.

Team sports for Frisbee players also include ultimate Frisbee and guts.

Ultimate Frisbee began on the east coast in the 1960s. It started as a popular beach sport, then the craze hit college and university campuses.

Marc Wisbey, freshman in biochemistry, watches as his Frisbee nears a campus art object used for a hole during a golf game Wednesday. The shot was good for a birdie.

Boisvert said ultimate Frisbee is a non-contact sport, self-officiated and is a cross between soccer and basketball, except that it employs a disc instead of a ball.

In guts Frisbee, four players who are on opposite teams standing 15 meters apart try to throw past their opponents to score a point. Some throws reach speeds up to 90 miles per hour and are hard to catch with one hand, Boisvert said.

The newest Frisbee sport is called discathalon. To play the game, a person begins at a given point and is clocked while throwing the disc through a marked trail. The player with the best time is the winner.

Serious Frisbee enthusiasts may carry up to three or four discs with them at all times.

There are several different types of discs. Some are made to go to the right or left and help players throw the discs around obstacles.

Beveled-edge discs are designed for flying longer distances. They can travel up to 150 yards. There also are other discs that have different flight patterns and novelty Frisbees such as those that glow in the dark.

Tennis shoes and Frisbees — the gear of disc golfers.

Frisbee enthusiast takes collection of discs seriously

For Mike Boisvert, junior in fisheries and wildlife biology, Frisbees are more than toys. Frisbees have become a hobby to him, and he has collected approximately 400 of the discs since his interest in the pastime was sparked.

Seven years ago, a friend of Boisvert aroused his curiosity about the Heart of America Frisbee Club in his hometown of Topeka.

His fascination with the Frisbee and introduction to the Frisbee club began what might be called a lifelong addiction.

"Ever since my friend took me to practice with him, I've been hooked, and I have been playing almost every day since," Boisvert said.

Boisvert began attending many tournaments with his newly found club, and whenever he went to a tournament, there was always a different kind of tournament disc to buy. The many tournaments he participated in were just the beginning of his interest in Frisbee as a sport as well as a hobby, he said.

He soon began swapping and trading at all the tournaments he could get to, and his collection of Frisbees steadily grew.

"I have approximately 400 Frisbees and they probably cost more than $2,000," Boisvert said.

Boisvert said that when he gets in the mood, he goes to garage sales where he finds a lot of his antique Frisbees. They also can be purchased from mail order catalogs, he said, adding that another good place to find Frisbees is to go to parks and other places where Frisbee enthusiasts go to play.

Boisvert has a wide range of discs in a variety of different shapes and sizes. Some are novelty and others are for use in specific Frisbee sports.

"There are a lot of types of Frisbees. There are Microminnies to Giant Saucer Tossers that are about the size of a trash can lid. And then there are some with wings that flap and whistle or ones with lights attached," Boisvert said.

His collection covers his four bedroom walls, and many of his discs are kept in boxes.

He said his favorite disc is his White Pluto Platter. It was first produced in the early 1950s, when its patent was still in the process of being granted.

"The Frisbee is very rare because it is white, and they didn't make them white in those days. It is worth about $500, and there are just four known to this day," Boisvert said.

He said the recent interest in the different types of Frisbee sports are not a new fad; they are here to stay.

"I want to stay in Frisbee as long as I can. There are a lot of senior world class championships being played every year, and I plan on being there one of these days," he said.

Dance troupe plans last show before move

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

The Susan Warden Dancers are scheduled to give their annual spring performance at 8 p.m. Friday in McCain Auditorium. This will be the last performance by the modern dance company before they move their base from Manhattan to Kansas City, Kan.

Susan Warden, assistant professor of dance, formed her dance company in 1979, asking three other women to join her. She said there were several reasons for wishing to continue her work outside the University setting.

The main reason for moving company is the difficulty she has had in attracting and keeping dancers in Manhattan, Warden said.

"I needed a more stable group where I could know the dancers well enough, and where they didn't change on me every semester. I needed older dancers who could get involved in some of the conceptual work," she said.

One reason was bureaucratic. Warden said she needed to call the shots on the development and direction of a company.

While she has been able to develop a stable group here, she said she believes the artists personally have reached a point where they need more outside stimulation to give a total commitment.

All of the dancers are making the move to Kansas City.

"That itself is a statement on the success of the group," Warden said.

The first year at Prescott Center, a renovated fire station in Kansas City, will be spent adjusting to the new location and touring. The company will continue to tour under the sponsorship of the Kansas Touring Arts Program for the fifth straight year and on the South Dakota Touring Arts Program for the second year. The company also is scheduled to return to K-State for a three-week residency for the next academic school year and to Central Missouri State University for a week's residency.

She said the University has been very supportive of her work, although initially some administrators may have had questions. The fact that the administration was willing to risk her going half-time at the University and let her explore artistically is a statement of support for her work, she said.

The dance company has grown since its first concert performance in its Humboldt Square studio. Warden scheduled two performances in spring 1979, which sold out, and added an extra performance to accommodate all who wanted to attend. It also sold out.

"I don't rely solely on external support, in the sense that if we hadn't had a sold-out performance, it probably would not have mattered. I've always felt that we are doing this for ourselves as much as for others. It's always been important to balance our personal process with the external support. A sold-out performance is icing on the cake. It was above and beyond any expectations we had," Warden said.

One change in the development of Warden's company has been the growth in significance of the im-provisational process as a part of her work. This resulted in part, she said, from new people coming into the company that had previous improvisational experience.

The Susan Warden Dancers began experimenting two years ago with improvisation on a daily basis. Last season improvisation was incorporated into the concerts performed on tour.

During the spring performance, the company will attempt something they have never done before in live performance.

"I started a piece on the K-State students called 'Prelude,' and that was simply the beginning of a much longer dramatic work. What we will be doing in Friday night's concert is a structured improvisation around the material first developed on the K-State students. The dancers will perform the opening structure of that work, and then they will improvise on the thematic material there," Warden said.

"It's a huge challenge," Doug Hosenev, senior in theater, said. As technical director for the concert, he will be improvising on lights and sound while the dancers improvise movement. Whatever Hosenev does will have a large effect on what the dancers do. Silence is always a possibility, he said.

Hosenev also is making the move and will be a permanent addition to the company. He has been hired as technical director and stage manager and will be responsible for designing lights, sound and taking care of advance touring arrangements.

Also in Friday's concert, Warden will present a new section in a suite of works set to music by Joan Armatrading. The original solo, "Stepping Out," was seen at the company's fall concert in Manhattan. Warden is in the process of rechoreographing the solo into a duet and adding another duet to form a quartet, which will perform a piece titled "Love and Affection."

Warden's choreography is versatile. She is working simultaneously on her dramatic piece "Prelude," the jazz-flavored suite to Armatrading's music, and completing a suite of opera pieces, of which "Spring Fever" and "Great Voices" are a part.

The personal growth that is required in Warden's dance company is secondary only to her artistic work.

"I have always believed that dance for me is a lifestyle — a means of living my life, but that the ultimate focus is how I choose to live," she said.

Making the choices and contacts to people with similar goals has been a rich experience, she said.

Working out the differences within the group and developing a group that is mutually supportive and trusting calls for a lot of personal growth, she said.

Educating audiences and performing for people who have never seen modern dance is another aspect of the dance company Warden said she enjoys.

Moving to Kansas City, the company faces the challenge of introducing modern dance as a permanent fixture. While Kansas City has been an enthusiastic supporter of its ballet company, it has yet to be called home for a modern dance company.

Reserved tickets for Friday's performance are on sale at the McCain box office for $5 for the general public and $3 for students and senior citizens.

Graduate students show artwork

Friday will be the last day the public will have the opportunity to view the Department of Art Graduate Student Show.

The show, which has been on exhibit in the Union Art Gallery since April 21, offers an array of artwork including sculpting, pottery, painting and lithography. The number of pieces on display by each graduate student ranges from three to 10 pieces.

Graduate students and the type of work they are exhibiting include lithographs by David Harnes, instructor and graduate in fine arts, and Judith Moloney, graduate in fine arts; paintings by Jerry Linton and Larry Zvolanek, graduates in fine arts; pottery by Gene Sievers, Glenda Taylor and Jerry Griffin, graduates in fine arts; and sculptures by John Hachmeister, graduate in fine arts.

Harnes said the purpose of the show is to have the opportunity to receive critiques from the public on the exhibitions.

"I gain a lot of insight and awareness about my work by going over there (Union Art Gallery) and listening to some of the comments (about the artworks)," he said.

The art show also offers a "good purchasing opportunity for the public and a chance to view work that has been done by K-State students," he said.

The exhibition may be viewed from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

John Hachmeister, graduate in fine arts, peers over his sculpture titled Homage to Dinsmoor. Hachmeister is one of eight artists whose work is on display until Friday in the K-State Union Art Gallery.

are history and geography. He has an excellent memory. He can name and locate every state, continent and ocean and several other countries," she said.

John also has attended classes local schools, churches and University for Man classes in addition to K-State.

Debbie Ingstrom, instructor of the trainable mentally handicapped at Manhattan Middle School, has worked with John on several occasions.

"He's been assumed by everyone except his mother to be a very limited individual. But John is still learning, still developing. There's a lot in there, if you can stick with him," she said.

Football teams choose defense early in draft

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — If the National Football League draft that ended just before 3 a.m. Wednesday looked pretty much the same as ever, that's because it was. But only on the surface.

There were the usual bubbly pronouncements from coaches and general managers about the magnificent abilities of their draftees.

There were the usual curiosities — sprinter Carl Lewis drafted by Dallas with the third-from-last pick; a former Toronto Blue Jays' baseball farmhand named Jay Schroeder, chosen by Washington on the third round as a quarterback; a linebacker named Jimmie Carter taken by Detroit, and a tackle named Byron Nelson chosen by New Orleans; a cry of "Akeem Olajuwon" from the gallery when it was the New York Giants' turn to pick.

But in this year of escalating war with the United States Football League, there were some just-below-the-surface differences beyond the obvious — the USFL's signing of glamor players like Mike Rozier, Steve Young and Reggie White diluted the draft and forced the NFL to virtually ignore quarterbacks and running backs and go primarily for defense, particularly in the critical first two rounds.

For one thing, NFL teams expecting post-draft USFL raids went to some lengths to make sure they could sign the players they drafted.

Because of rumors that he was asking about $1 million a year or was committed to the USFL's Tampa Bay Bandits, Florida linebacker Wilber Marshall lasted until the 11th pick of the first round, when he was taken by the Chicago Bears. Marshall denounced the rumors as untrue and immediately began negotiating with the Bears.

There also were moves suggesting that NFL teams have learned some things from the flexibility of the USFL, which allows any team that thinks it can sign a player to negotiate with him regardless of who holds his rights.

The Dallas Cowboys, for example, used the 26th pick on the fourth round to pick Steve DeOssie, a Boston College linebacker who was a first-round pick of the USFL's New Jersey Generals. Then the Cowboys announced they had signed him, something they couldn't have done had they not negotiated with him beforehand.

Then there was the trade in which the Cleveland Browns gave the Chicago Bears their last four picks in return for all three Bears' picks in the supplemental draft next month, when NFL teams will pick the members of the Class of '84 who have signed with the USFL.

One NFL source suggested that the trade stemmed from the desire

MU, ISU to battle for 4th position in championships

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The University of Missouri and Iowa State University are taking their battle for the final spot in the Big Eight Conference Baseball Tournament into the final weekend of the regular season. The advantage seems to lie with the Tigers.

The University of Nebraska, the University of Oklahoma and Oklahoma State University, in the meanwhile, are all ranked nationally among the top 10 and have wrapped up three of the four places in the conference tourney May 10-13. The tourney winner gets the Big Eight's automatic entry in the National Collegiate Athletic Association Baseball Tournament, the College World Series.

Missouri ends the regular season this weekend with double-headers Saturday and Sunday at Oklahoma. Iowa State has two games the same days at K-State.

Rainout possibilities make exact calculations impossible. But based on the each team playing all four games this weekend, Missouri would gain the final playoff spot with a combination of one victory and one Iowa State loss. That would put them in a tie and the Tigers would get the nod based on their beating Iowa State three out of their four regular season meetings.

Missouri stands 23-15 overall and 5-6 in the conference, compared with Iowa State's 16-23, 5-11 mark.

Chiefs make mistake

The Kansas City Chiefs don't seem to want to win in the National Football League.

When a team that ranked at the bottom of the league defensive statistics trades its best defender, there's something wrong with the powers that be in the front office.

But that's what the Chiefs did when they sent three-time all-pro cornerback Gary Green packing to the Los Angeles Rams in return for first- and fifth-round draft choices in this year's collegiate draft.

In return for Green, the Chiefs picked up offensive tackle John Alt from the University of Iowa in the first round and Texas A&M University linebacker Jeff Paine in round No. 5.

While those draft choices filled holes in the Chiefs' roster, the Green trade still hurt the team more than helped it. In Green the Chiefs had a bona fide superstar, one of the few bright spots in a mediocre defense. In Alt and Paine the Chiefs have players that are unknown talents.

Behind the trade were rumors of a rift between Green and Kansas City head coach John Mackovic. In the past, Green had been known to question the Chiefs' front office's commitment to winning in the NFL.

Yet, the players showed their respect for Green by naming him team co-captain and the most valuable player of the 1982 season. Green was a leader — the kind of player a team needs to win.

By trading Green, it's hard to say if winning is something that really interests the Chiefs.

The Chiefs have failed to make the playoffs for 12 straight seasons. In recent years, Kansas City has had only one good year, a

TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

500 season in 1981. Obviously something is wrong in the way the Chiefs' program is being operated. While the club has had its share of bad luck — the Joe Delaney drowning accident is the worst example — it has been unable to bounce back from adversity like most teams.

No example of the Chiefs' inept decision making better illustrates the problem than the destruction of its once strong defensive secondary. Since last summer, the Chiefs have rid themselves of three outstanding pass defenders.

Cornerback Eric Harris teamed well with Green to cover the passing lanes as well as any combination in the NFL. But the Chiefs traded Harris to the Rams for a draft choice and runningback Jewell Thomas, who the team promptly traded to the San Diego Chargers on Tuesday for an undisclosed 1985 draft pick. At least the Rams are gaining something from the Chiefs' misfortunes.

A bigger loss was the departure of fierce-hitting, all-pro safety Gary Barbaro to the USFL. The Chiefs failed to take Barbaro's contract negotiations seriously in the beginning, which ended in bad blood on the bargaining table. When the time came for the Chiefs to submit their best offer, Barbaro was more content to take a lower offer by the New Jersey Generals than play in Kansas City.

So now the Chiefs are stuck with a defensive backfield unit that could be one of the league's worst. Besides safety Deron Cherry, the team is saddled with sub-standard performers. Mark Robinson, the Chiefs' fourth-round draft pick from Pennsylvania State University, may have to fill the big space left by Green's exit.

Since Mackovic's arrival as coach last season, the Chiefs have continually stressed a strong passing game as the key to winning in the NFL. But defending the pass doesn't seem to have as large a priority in the team's thinking. Mackovic must see passing as something only the Chiefs can use, even if the Chargers, the Los Angeles Raiders and Seattle Seahawks also have strong aerial arsenals in the AFC West division.

A draft is designed to help strengthen a team rather than weaken it. Although the Chiefs' draft wasn't bad — the pick of University of Pittsburgh defensive lineman Bill Maas should provide some immediate help — the Green trade has negated any gains made.

But events like these should be commonplace for Chiefs fans. They're the ones who have had to watch the Chiefs fumble their way to sub-par seasons year after year. With Gary Green gone from the Chiefs' secondary, there should be plenty of scoring done at Arrowhead Stadium in the 1984 season. The problem will be that most of the excitement should be supplied by the Chiefs' opponents.

Draft

of Art Modell, the Browns' aggressive owner, to get into a direct bidding war with the USFL. The Bears, the source suggested, were not so inclined.

As for the draft itself, some winners appeared to be the New York Giants and Jets, Cincinnati Bengals, New England Patriots, the Bears and the Cowboys. The Los Angeles Rams also appeared to do well, despite being without a pick until the fifth round.

The Rams went for immediate help, giving up a first and a fifth choice for defensive back Gary Green of Kansas City, a three-time All-Pro. Earlier, they had surrendered their second pick for the rights to Ron Brown, the world-class sprinter who declined to sign with the Browns last year after being drafted in the second round.

The Giants went into the draft with two options — pick to their strength by using their first pick, third overall, to take Michigan State linebacker Carl Banks, or trade down and plug a huge hole by taking Ohio State tackle Bill Roberts.

As it turned out, they picked Banks, then traded their second-round pick for Washington's late first-round pick and grabbed Roberts.

The Jets, with four picks in the first two rounds, grabbed four players who could provide immediate help — SMU defensive back Russell Carter, Arkansas defensive end Ron Fautot, center Jim Sweeney of Pittsburgh and tight end Glenn Dennison of Miami.

Cincinnati used its three first-round choices to go for beef — linebacker Ricky Hunley of Arizona, defensive lineman Pete Koch of Maryland and 310-pound offensive tackle Brian Blados of North Carolina.

NATIONAL DAY OF PRAYER, 1984

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
A PROCLAMATION

In 1787, a then-elderly Benjamin Franklin said to George Washington as he presided over the Constitutional Convention, "I have lived, sir, a long time, and the longer I live the more convincing proofs I see of this truth, that God governs in the affairs of men. And if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without his notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without his aid?"

With these words, Mr. Franklin called upon the Convention to open each day with prayer, and from the birth of our Republic, prayer has been vital to the whole fabric of American life.

As we crossed and settled a continent, built a Nation in freedom, and endured war and critical struggles to become the leader of the world and a sentinel of liberty, we repeatedly turned to our Maker for strength and guidance in achieving the awesome tasks before us.

From the poignancy of General Washington's legendary prayer in the snow at Valley Forge to the dangerous times in which we live today, our leaders and the people of this Nation have called upon Divine Providence and trusted in God's wisdom to guide us through the challenges we have faced as a people and a Nation.

Whether at the landing of our forebears in New England and Virginia, the ordeal of the Revolutionary War, the stormy days of binding the thirteen colonies into one country, the Civil War, or other moments of trial over the years, we have turned to God for His help. As we are told in II Chronicles 7:14, "If my people, who are called by my name, will humble themselves and pray and seek My face and turn from their wicked ways, then I will hear from heaven and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land."

By Joint Resolution of the Congress approved in 1952, the recognition of a particular day set aside each year as a National Day of Prayer has become part of our unification as a great Nation. This is a day on which the people of the United States are invited to turn to God in prayer and meditation in places of worship or as groups and individuals. Since 1952, each President has proclaimed annually a Day of Prayer to the Nation, resuming the tradition started by the Continental Congress.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, RONALD REAGAN, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim Thursday, May 3, 1984, as "National Day of Prayer." I call upon the citizens of this great Nation to gather on that day in homes and places of worship to pray, each after his or her own manner, for unity of the hearts of all mankind.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this 14th day of December, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighty-three, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and eighth.

RONALD REAGAN

At 5 a.m. your horns did blow, and down to breakfast we did go. At formal robes you did receive, and they were well deserved, I believe. Don't think that I'm a fanatic, or even anticlimatic. # University, British institution to exchange art professors

By LINDA SCHMIDT
Collegian Reporter

Instead of teaching in the middle of the United States, Gary Woodward, associate professor of art, will teach in the middle of England for the 1984-1985 school year.

Woodward will teach the drawing classes of Christopher Nicholas Fleming at Manchester Polytechnic in Manchester, England. In return, Fleming will teach Woodward's Advanced Drawing, Drawing II, and Drawing III classes at K-State.

The exchange is made possible through the Fulbright Foundation, a nationwide exchange program sponsored by the U.S. Department of Education.

Applying for the exchange involved filling out forms and applications, Woodward said, and he also was interviewed in Kansas City, Mo., by a regional panel. The panel considers applicants' character and adaptability and determines if a candidate is a good representative of K-State and the United States.

His portfolios were approved by the University, and the foundation completed the rest of the paper work.

Besides classrooms, Woodward and Fleming will be trading lifestyles and homes.

"It's a neat, neat setup," Woodward said. "I'll pick up four suitcases, and that's all. I'm not taking any art equipment since that goes with the exchange also. Manchester Polytechnic is like K-State in that it also has a College of Architecture, Arts and Sciences and so on."

It's (the exchange program) put together well, Woodward said. Changing places could be difficult, but it's made simple, he said.

Woodward said he applied specifically to go to Great Britain because he has never been to Europe or experienced the culture.

There are 14,000 students at Manchester Polytechnic, which is large by British standards, Woodward said. The average size of a college or university in England is comparable to American junior colleges.

He said he plans to leave the United States on Aug. 15, begin teaching Sept. 20 and continue through July 15.

The exchange has advantages for all involved and "benefits the students like crazy," Woodward said.

"It's a free exchange of ideas to each university," Diane Dollar, instructor of art, said.

K-State will provide Woodward's salary. Likewise, Fleming will be paid by Manchester Polytechnic.

"It's particularly neat for an artist to go to the continent of Europe with all the museums and ancient kinds of things to see," Woodward said.

"I'll get a chance to see the things I've always heard about."

This is the second such exchange within the Department of Art in the last three years. Duane Noblett, assistant professor of art, participated in a Fulbright exchange during the 1981-1982 school year.

Noblett exchanged positions with a drawing and painting instructor from London for 11 months.

"I had to change pace a lot," Noblett said. "They have less in the way of broad classes, such as sociology, and they go basically all day in studios. At K-State you would likely have a two-hour studio with a one-hour lecture."

Noblett said he noticed visible student development with the all-day schedule.

"It's a tremendous opportunity for an artist," Noblett said. "And the involvement with students is very good."

"You spend half the time adjusting, and then the last six months you wish you had another year," Noblett said. "One year was a good amount of time to be away, as to not feel apart upon returning. The driving was interesting, too."

Interns study exotic animals during summer zoo program

By RACHEL VINING
Contributing Writer

When Pat Wahlmeir was growing up on a farm near Norton, he never thought he would someday have a Bengal tiger, a retired circus camel or a family of chimpanzees in his care. But, for three weeks last summer, this K-State senior in veterinary medicine learned how to work with, and even do minor surgery on, exotic animals at Manhattan's Sunset Zoo.

Wahlmeir was one of five students in a program made possible through cooperation between K-State's College of Veterinary Medicine and the city. This summer will be the second season for zoo internships.

Diana Andrews, senior in veterinary medicine and a zoo intern last summer, explained the program.

"Each year the school (College of Veterinary Medicine) hires 20 students to work the summer rotation at the K-State clinic," Andrews said. "The five who have a special interest in exotic animals get to be put on the zoo rotation."

The program is called a rotation because the summer interns work in a different area every three weeks. The students who rotate to the zoo stay for three weeks, working with zoo keepers and exotic animals.

Dr. James Coffman, head of the department of surgery and medicine and now in charge of the veterinary medicine aspect of the cooperative program, said students at K-State are fortunate to have the chance to work with the Sunset Zoo.

"Not many get the opportunity to do just zoo work, even if it is just for three weeks," he said. "This gives the student the chance to examine his or her specific interests."

Gerry Brady, Sunset Zoo director, said each intern will work all day Monday through Friday, following a general routine.

"We set up a schedule for them," Brady said. "Usually from 8 to 10 a.m. they'll go through and check pens along with the zoo keepers. They may have to medicate animals on the first round."

He said that after a break following the morning rounds, it is usually time for lab work. This might mean taking and testing fecal samples.

"We have every intern go through a whole fecal collection for all of the animals. It gives them good experience because they will have to do this in a real practice. Plus, this testing tells us when we have trouble with internal parasites in the animals," Brady said.

When an animal is sick or potentially ill, it will be pulled down by physical or chemical restraint, depending on the size and strength of the animal. Then when it is down, the students take blood, urine and lymph fluid samples. The tests on the samples are run in the labs at the veterinary college.

Sometime during their three-week internship, students have the chance to work on a special project. Wahlmeir's project was to reimplant a hormone into a female Bengal tiger to prevent her from coming into heat.

"The intern before me had put it in, but she (the tiger) tore out the implant," Wahlmeir said. We cleaned up the wound and inserted the implant back under the skin in a different place."

Andrews' project was to help diagnose and treat the long-term foot problems of an old circus camel.

"I radiographed Charlie's hooves, and I also tried to be around when other projects were going on," Andrews said.

The interns agreed that before any treatment, just becoming familiar with the animals is the first step in telling if they are healthy. Through the zoo keepers and watching the exotic animals, the students said they learned much about the animals and the zoo.

"The zoo keepers and the staff were very helpful," Wahlmeir said. "Anything you asked, they would explain and let you know about things. If they didn't know something, they'd find out for you."

Andrews echoed Wahlmeir's feelings.

"Together the faculty (in the veterinary college) and the zoo staff have a very positive influence. The zoo keepers are especially a tremendous help. They explain the animals' behavior — what is normal and what is sick."

Observing the exotic animals' behavior is a large part of the training at the zoo. Wahlmeir said the students react a little like most people around exotic animals.

"It is interesting just to have the chance to work with exotics. But they can always present a certain element of fear, especially with the big cats and bears. And, with some of the smaller animals, such as the birds and reptiles, I'm just in awe," he said.

However, Wahlmeir and the others do not let the strangeness of zoo animals get in the way of their work to be done at the zoo or at the veterinary hospital.

Coffman said that when any zoo animals are brought to the hospital, they are almost always brought to the surgery and medicine division. About five different departmental labs are cooperatively used by the zoo and the college.

Each of the groups of people involved in the college and zoo internship program said they appreciate the opportunity to help the other.

"It really is a unique chance to learn," Andrews said. "After observing an animal's behavior and then actually treating the animal, you feel as if you really had some input."

He said that because there is so much to be learned from working with the animals, the main benefit of the rotation program is being involved every day for three weeks, instead of just waiting until an exotic animal with problems is brought in to the veterinary hospital.

Andrews said she would like to eventually work at a zoo or wildlife park, or at least be a consulting veterinarian to a zoo. She said she plans to start in a small animal practice with some small exotics.

"I wanted to do the internship mainly because it intrigued me," Wahlmeir said. "I'll probably go into a practice without exotics, but I'm really glad this program allows interested students to have the opportunity to go out and get that experience. The experience of working with exotic animals can't help but make you well-rounded."

Through all the hands-on experience the students receive, Brady and the college make sure the professional consulting veterinarians or K-State veterinary faculty are there at all times to guide the students, because the animals are most important.

Student volunteers offer support to Big Brothers/Big Sisters chapter

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

As of Wednesday, the Manhattan Big Brothers/Big Sisters program included 107 matched pairs of youth and adults. But, said Tim McHenry, a caseworker for the program, the number of matches changes every day, the most drastic change coinciding with K-State graduation.

"I'd say 60 percent of the volunteers in this area are students," McHenry said. "With a lot of students graduating, a lot of matches will change."

McHenry said most of the volunteers are male because the majority of children on the waiting list are male.

"Presently we have 64 children on the waiting list," he said. "Of those, 56 are boys. This pattern is prevalent through most agencies."

The local Big Brothers/Big Sisters program has records dating to 1961, he said, but has only been operating at its current level since 1978. McHenry said the program serves mainly the Manhattan area and some cases from Ogden.

K-State students, he said, have been a major contributor to the program.

"Students have proven to be outstanding volunteers," McHenry said. "Fraternalities and sororities have been real good. They've just been a blessing."

Another potential source for volunteers that hasn't really been looked into, he said, is Fort Riley.

"I don't even think we've scratched the surface there yet," he said. "We've had a number of outstanding military men, both enlisted men and officers, involved in the program," he said.

"They're the third largest base in the country. It's a resource we need to tap into."

Being part of the United Way, a substantial portion of the program's funding comes from that agency, but McHenry said the most funding comes from city revenue sharing, in which the federal government makes funds available to cities that apply for them.

"We've been a recipient of those funds for about three years," McHenry said. "It's what we call soft money in that we don't know if we'll receive it from one year to the next."

The program employs an in-depth screening process which involves several interviews and a criminal record check with the Kansas Bureau of Investigation. This process is not designed to eliminate people, McHenry said, but is based on concern for the children in the program and the blending of personalities and interests of volunteers.

"Typically these children don't like themselves. They feel responsible for the loss of a parent through divorce, etc.," he said.

"We do ask volunteers not to spend a lot of money on the children. You take them out for pizza one week, then they expect chinese food the next week and then a 10-speed bike. Their expectations have a snowballing effect," McHenry said.

McHenry said the program costs as much as the volunteer wants it to cost. A volunteer doesn't have to spend anything, he said.

Alumni return to campus

More than 400 alumni and their guests are expected to attend spring reunions today and Friday.

The reunions are sponsored by the K-State Alumni Association, Grace Prusik, alumni coordinator of special events, said.

The classes of 1934, 1939 and 1944 are joining to hold their 50th, 45th and 40th reunions, respectively. The alumni will be joined by members of the Golden K Club, an honorary organization which meets annually for those who graduated from K-State 50 years ago or more.

Gordon Goering, a 1945 graduate, has been selected as the 1984 Alumni Fellow for the College of Engineering. Goering, senior vice president of the Petroleum Products Group of Phillips Petroleum Company, will address the alumni Friday evening at the All Grads Banquet.

Melville Mudge, a 1947 graduate who currently is a consulting geologist for the petroleum industry, was honored this spring by the Alumni Fellows Program for the College of Arts and Sciences, Prusik said.

The Alumni Fellows Program brings prominent alumni back to K-State to share their expertise through informal contacts with students, faculty and administrators.

K-State President Duane Acker is scheduled to give his annual "State of the University" address at the banquet.

Registration for visiting alumni will begin at 9 a.m. today in Union 212.

Deans from the academic colleges will host noon luncheons Thursday, and class dinners with entertainment provided by the K-State Singers will conclude the day's activities.

The traditional Golden K Breakfast is scheduled for 8 a.m. Friday. Seventy-five members of the class of 1934 will be inducted into the club at that time. The alumni will be hosted by Acker and his wife at a reception in the president's home Friday.

Library group to enhance University

Farrell Library will host an organizational meeting of Friends of the Library at 7:30 p.m. today in Farrell 101.

The library has been authorized by the KSU Foundation to form such an organization and collect dues. The library has not determined the official name of the organization.

The purpose of the group is to enrich the total resources and facilities of the library, stimulate awareness of the library's role in the development of K-State, increase financial support for special projects and sponsor programs to enhance the cultural activity of the University, Brice Hobrock, dean of the libraries, said.

Among the special projects the library has planned are the purchase of a special volume to commemorate the acquisition of the 1 millionth volume at Farrell.

Membership in the organization is open to all faculty, staff and students interested in supporting the library.

Local comedy group seeks recognition

By STEVE SWAFFORD
Collegian Reporter

That old limelight has a special glow that attracts people from every background, race and heritage. Most people watch while a select few strive for the stage.

Fighting for recognition on the entertainment stage is Manhattan's Complex Improvisational Theater. The complex consists of six K-State students.

Rick Efros, graduate student in education administration and foundations and a member of the complex for four years, said the group began seven or eight years ago under the name of the Not Ready For K-State Players. For the last three years it has been recognized as the Complex Improvisational Theater.

Efros said the group started with Saturday Night Live-style material and switched to improvisational situations and sketches in 1981. The group uses a mixture of patented and original material for its shows.

Brenda Pontiff, graduate in speech, said she enjoys developing some of the sketches for the group. She said the complex gives her the opportunity to write sketches particularly for the characters she has to work with and then watch the outcome on stage.

Pontiff is the "new kid on the block" since she joined the theater this semester.

Cham Ferguson, senior in speech, said the group performs in front of many different types of audiences.

"The audiences recognize the fact that you may fail while on stage. The audience is out there pulling for you, because if you fail, they do too," Ferguson said.

Efros said the more knowledgeable audiences are generally more receptive to comedy.

"People that are knowledgeable can pick up on things much faster. You don't have to always do sex jokes because they are more aware of the events around them that we can play off of — they don't have to be spoon fed," he said.

Two years ago the group went through Colorado playing at clubs and doing sidewalk shows at night.

"Once a bum came up to us and was asking us if we could break a $22 bill that was counterfeit. He kept harassing us while we were performing on the street, so we made him part of the show," Ferguson said.

He said the group was playing a type of satellite war game and they used the bum as a prop during the sketch, saying he was a Russian satellite and attacking him.

"Out on the street everything and everyone becomes a prop that we can use," Efros said.

Ferguson said it is easier to perform when the audience is there to see the show or comedy in general.

"If the audience is going in to see comedy and they are expecting it, it makes for a better crowd," he said.

Financially, the group must go out on faith for their summer tour.

"We are one of the few groups that goes on tour before we even know where our money is going to come from," Ferguson said.

He said the group applied for grants this year but was denied. The group also tried to raise solicit and money two years ago and it was just a hassle, he said. At one point the group even tried to get a beer company to sponsor a bus with its logo on the side for publicity, but that effort also was unsuccessful.

The complex's summer tour begins May 24-27, when they will perform in Kansas City, Mo. at the Comedy House. On June 5, the group will perform at the Blue Note in Boulder, Colo. The same week it will do shows in Ft. Collins, Colo. The group is scheduled to arrive back in Manhattan June 15-17 to entertain at the Arts and Crafts Show. In late June and early July the group is scheduled to entertain in the Aspen and Crested Butte, Colo., areas doing sidewalk shows and club performances.

Ferguson said that two years ago tensions developed in the gap during the summer tour. He said the complex is a way of release for those tensions.

"When we do complex, the tensions sometimes come out while we are on stage. A pseudo argument develops within the sketch," Efros said.

In addition, Efros said, feedback sessions are held after each show to critique what happened.

"I have been impressed with the group because I have messed up several times and they have not severely reprimanded me for messing up — yet," Pontiff said.

Ferguson said the members work together like a team.

"Everybody is expected to do their work, and when a person makes a mistake, the individual is their own worst critic. We know when we mess up. Individual criticism is left up to them," he said.

Efros and Ferguson agreed that each individual has enough talent to make it on their own, but Ferguson said it is not as safe alone.

"I want to stay together and work together for a number of years, as long as it is feasible. I'd like to settle down in our own city and own our own theater someday," Ferguson said.

Council objections bring compromise

University reverses recent towing plan

By MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

A temporary policy that includes two measures to deal with the change in the towing policy made in April by Gene Cross, vice president for University Facilities, has been approved by the Traffic and Parking Council.

The council developed a resolution to deal with its displeasure over Cross' policy change. The change required the permission of Cross or Art Stone, director of K-State Police, before any illegally parked vehicles could be towed from parking stalls.

The temporary policy, which went into effect approximately one month after Cross' policy change on March 28, involves the placement of tow-away signs on all reserved stalls on campus. It also returns the tow policy to its original form, as stated in the 1983-84 Traffic and Parking Regulations Handbook, which allowed uniformed officers to have illegally parked vehicles towed without the authorization of either Stone or Cross.

In a resolution dated April 30, the council recommended that "all persons parking their vehicles on campus be required to obey posted traffic and parking regulations," and further recommended that "all violations of these rules which are contested be considered on an individual basis by the appropriate traffic appeals board."

The resolution states the council's opposition to "the sudden change in the tow policy which does not conform with stated policy in the KSU Traffic and Parking Regulations Handbook and which was made without consultation with the Traffic and Parking Council."

Campus police began immediate work on the placement of the tow-away signs, which is scheduled for completion this week.

"The police staff has completed about two-thirds of the placement of the tow-away signs," said Elizabeth Edwards, campus police sign staff and council member.

Edwards said the change was a compromise and "an interim measure agreed upon until the council and Cross could develop a long-term solution to the towing problem on campus."

Officers, however, may not be fully aware of the current policy regarding towing, and few, if any, vehicles parked in reserved stalls have been towed since Cross' policy change, Edwards said.

The council is working to develop a long-term policy to eliminate the need for Stone or Cross to authorize the towing of any vehicles.

Edwards said one solution to the problem under discussion by the council may be the establishment of reserved lots around campus with gates or card access systems available only to owners of reserved stalls. She said the council is working with Cross on this possibility and has recommended which lots would be suitable for reserved lots.

Iraq attacks oil tanker in Persian Gulf conflict

By The Associated Press

MANAMA, Bahrain — Iraqi warplanes attacked an oil tanker and set it ablaze in the Persian Gulf on Sunday, Iran reported. Shipping sources said the tanker was owned by the Turkish government and was headed for Iran's Kharg Island.

Iraqi state radio in Baghdad interrupted regular programs Sunday to announce that a formation of Iraqi jets attacked "two large naval targets" southeast of Kharg Island.

Marine shipping salvage companies in Bahrain said they picked up distress signals from only one ship, the 153,000-ton tanker Buyuk Hun, which they said was struck 50 miles south of Kharg, Iran's main oil terminal on the gulf.

There was no immediate reaction from officials in Turkey, which has been important to Iraq during the 3½-year-old Iran-Iraq war. All of Iraq's oil exports flow by pipeline to the Turkish port of Doryol because the war has cut its ability to export oil through the gulf.

The ship, owned by the Turkish national oil company Iprass, was heading north to Kharg and had not yet taken on oil when hit, said the sources, who spoke on condition they not be identified. It was to return to Turkey.

A missile struck the crew's quarters, setting the tanker ablaze and sending its Turkish crew scrambling to life rafts, according to the salvage company sources.

Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency, monitored in Cyprus, reported that Iranian rescue teams had saved all of the ship's crew. But it said the tanker was still ablaze at 2 p.m. (7 a.m. EDT), nearly four hours after being hit.

IRNA quoted a military official in Tehran as saying the tanker was attacked by a French-made Super Etendard warplane. The agency said the missiles were fired from a "relatively long distance," and that "all indications are that the missiles were of the French-made Exocet type."

Iraq is known to have acquired five Super Etendards and a number of Exocet missiles from France in recent months.

Turkish Premier Turgut Ozal returned this week from a visit to Iraq and said he had secured an agreement for Iraq to purchase $1 billion worth of Turkish foods, steel and manufactured products.

Turkey's foreign minister, Vahit Halefoglu, told a news conference in Washington on Friday that his country had tried to be a peacemaker in the Iran-Iraq war. He said that Iraq was willing to discuss peace, but Iran was not.

IRNA charged that the reported Iraqi attack Sunday was a direct result of a United Nations Security Council resolution adopted last Friday, which called on Iran to refrain from attacking neutral vessels in the gulf, but did not mention Iraq. It was adopted after the six-member Gulf Cooperation Council complained about Iranian attacks on three tankers from Kuwait and Saudi Arabia last month.

Tehran Radio also quoted an unidentified Foreign Ministry official as repeating Iran's threat to disrupt "all oil exports through the gulf" if Iran's oil exports were blocked.

Iraq has said it is trying to block Iranian exports to cripple Iran's ability to finance the war, which started with an Iraqi invasion of Iran in September 1980.

The United States has said it is committed to keeping the gulf oil lanes open.

Indian ruler seals off state in effort to end terrorism

By The Associated Press

AMRITSAR, India — The government sealed off Punjab state on Sunday and sent thousands of army troops in to try to end the Sikh terrorism that has claimed 350 lives in the past three months.

All rail and road travel was banned, and an immediate blackout on news coverage was declared by Indian President Zail Singh, who is a Sikh.

The government had said Saturday that the army was being sent to aid civilian authorities. There has been no official declaration of martial law.

However, S.S. Bagga, commander of the paramilitary Border Security Forces in the city of Jullundur, 200 miles north of the capital of New Delhi, said Sunday, "Martial law is in force now."

The restrictions, including a 36-hour curfew, were announced after 20 people, mostly Hindus, were killed and 16 were wounded in hit-and-run attacks by Sikh terrorists since Saturday night.

Punjab had already been declared off-limits to foreigners, including journalists, without special permits, and news coverage of the Punjab crisis was banned for two months beginning immediately.

It was not known how the blackout would be enforced or whether it applied to foreign news organizations. The night before the censorship order was imposed, the government had refused to allow transmission of two Associated Press photographs from Amritsar.

Officials report at least 40 people have been killed since Friday, and more than 70 have been injured. At least 84 people were killed last month, 350 in the past three months and 600 in three years.

Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's government called out tens of thousands of soldiers to clamp down on Sikh extremists, who have engaged in widespread killing, arson and looting.

The Sikhs, who outnumber Hindus in Punjab, seek establishment of an autonomous state.

On Sunday, the Sikhs' Akali Dal Party rejected an appeal from Gandhi to call off a planned blockade of grain shipments from Punjab, the nation's breadbasket, to other states.

Army troops in Amritsar were seen deploying Sunday near the 17th-century Golden Temple, the Sikhs' holiest shrine.

Militants inside the temple have promised a bloodbath if police or troops enter the fortress-like complex which government authorities say is a terrorist hideout and arms warehouse.

"We are ready to die. We will not surrender the arms," said extremist leader Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale, who lives in the temple complex with hundreds of armed supporters. About 3,000 Sikhs live on the temple grounds.

All telephone lines to the temple have been cut and all roads leading to it have been blocked.

The 36-hour curfew against all travel, including use of cattle-drawn carts, went into effect at 9 p.m. Sunday. Earlier in the day, the state government suspended indefinitely all train service in Punjab.

Hospital auxiliary holds fund-raiser

Ice cream social supports scholarships

By STEVE WAFFORD
Staff Writer

About 500 people attended the 30th annual Memorial Hospital Auxiliary Ice Cream Social on the hospital's lawn Sunday evening.

Nancy Haines, director of volunteer services for 26 years, was on the committee that initiated the social in 1954. She said the auxiliary was organized before the hospital formally opened its doors in June 1954. The social was started to promote the new hospital.

"We were proud of our new hospital and people wanted to see it. The first year, we took people on a tour of the facility, but we don't do that anymore," she said.

She said in 1959, the auxiliary spent $2.82 on coffee for the event and in 1960, 5 pounds of sugar cost 53 cents. In 1962, ice cream for the social cost $59.92 compared to this year's ice cream which cost almost $150.

Every year the entertainment for the social changes. This year the Manhattan High School Blue Notes jazz band provided the music for the three-hour event.

The auxiliary has not determined a special project for the group this year, but there is an ongoing scholarship program for four nurses and one dietetic student at the Manhattan Area Vocational-Technical School. This is the fifth year the auxiliary has presented five $100 scholarships, Haines said.

"Some of the girls wouldn't be able to stay in the program (without the scholarship) because they couldn't buy the books," she said.

Since the school began, Haines added, the auxiliary has purchased Florence Nightingale Lamps for all the graduates.

The group also provides special-needs purchases and supplies financial support of the Medimate program. The Medimate program is a service for the elderly and handicapped. Currently, there are 12 people using the service at $15 a month for which the auxiliary takes care of the bill, Haines said.

"Any money raised by the auxiliary is the hospital's. The auxiliary has an executive board and it has the privilege of voting which equipment to purchase, but all the money goes back to the hospital," she said.

In the past, the auxiliary has remodeled the waiting area and has purchased items for the nursery and surgery areas of the hospital.

Haines said the first few years the auxiliary made a comfortable profit from the ice cream social but through the years, with the rising costs of items, it is now mainly a social event.

In addition to the ice cream, volunteers served more than 100 different desserts which were donated for the social by local service groups and service sororities. Manhattan Men's Garden Club served lemonade and tea, and the Boy Scouts also helped with the social.

"An event like this can only take place with the total cooperation of many many people," Nancy Kopp, manager of the hospital gift shop, said.

The auxiliary has more than 200 individual memberships and 20 group memberships which include church groups and volunteer organizations.

Library announces schedule of hours for summer school

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, has announced a new schedule of hours for Farrell Library to help meet the needs of students taking summer school.

The library will be open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. today. Beginning Tuesday and through July 26, the library will be open 7:30 a.m. to 10 p.m. Monday through Thursday.

Starting Friday and until July 26, the library's Friday hours will be 7:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. The library will be open 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. on Saturdays beginning this week and continuing until July 21. On Sundays the library will be open from 2 p.m. until 10 p.m. through July 22.

One of the services that the library offers to the campus is the reserve department. The purpose of this department is to ensure the accessibility of course materials to the students on a restricted and timely basis.

The collection consists of materials including required and recommended readings by the instructors, sample exams, homework solutions and lecture notes. Short loan periods provide increased access to the materials.

The charge for the first hour a item is overdue is $1 and with each additional hour an item is overdue, the person is charged 25 cents an hour. The total fine per day is $5.

The reserve department is in the basement of Farrell and is open the same times as the library.

Lost couple found immersed in dam

By The Associated Press

OMAHA — The bodies of 20-year-old Brian McEwen and 17-year-old Beth Ann Brooks, missing since they attended the Millard South High School prom May 12, were discovered Sunday in a Jeep Wagoneer submerged in a dam, authorities said.

The couple apparently were victims of a traffic accident and no foul play was suspected, officials said at a late Sunday afternoon news conference.

The pair mysteriously vanished while en route to an after-prom party at an Omaha motel. Officials had suspected foul play and organized massive ground and air searches for the couple in eastern Nebraska.

Millard is as suburb of Omaha. Authorities in neighboring states also were alerted to be on the lookout for the couple and their burnt-orange Jeep Wagoneer. The parents of the couple had appealed for help in locating the two on national television, and officials received telephone calls about possible sightings of the youths from several states.

Douglas County Sheriff Richard Roth said the search for the missing pair ended about 12:30 p.m. Sunday when their bodies were found inside the vehicle, which was immersed in several feet of water at Damsite 20 in neighboring Sarpy County.

He said a State Patrol officer had noticed an oil slick on top of the water at the dam site Saturday night and told a patrolman on the Sunday morning shift to check it out.

Divers entered the water Sunday morning and brought the vehicle to the surface about 4 p.m. The discovery of the bodies wasn't announced until a late afternoon press conference.

Concerned friends of the couple's families had just announced this weekend a campaign to put posters at truck stops and gas stations across Nebraska asking for any information that might lead authorities to the missing pair. They also had printed up matchbooks asking, "Have you seen Brian and Beth?"

Buttons posing the same question have been worn for weeks by family members and friends of McEwen and Brooks.

The buttons and matchbooks were the latest step in a well-organized campaign to keep the case in the public eye.

The Brooks-McEwen Assistance Fund had been set up at the Bank of Millard to help defray expenses of the two families as they searched for their children.

Some attempts disguised as accidents

Suicides up despite stronger economy

By College Press Service

The higher incidence of college student stress and suicide that many college counselors attributed to the recession hasn't abated with the improvement in the economy, campus counseling experts have reported.

"The effects of an improved economy and job market just haven't trickled down to help the students much yet," said Debra Allen, associate director of counseling services at the University of Illinois.

Three Illinois students and one professor have committed suicide this school year, she said, and there have been at least six unsuccessful suicide attempts during the same period.

Recently, a University of South Carolina professor, despondent after he was denied tenure, took a student hostage, barricaded himself in the president's office, and finally committed suicide.

Two University of Southern California students have taken their own lives this year, while two others have tried, said Lt. Art Blair of the school's security department.

At Middle Tennessee State, a student security patrol officer killed himself last semester after murdering his girlfriend, a University of Tennessee student.

And a Columbia University student killed himself just before the Christmas holidays by jumping in front of a freight train.

There may be other incidents, too. "There are a lot of accidents by college students that are increasingly being viewed as suicide attempts disguised as accident," said Javad Kashani, a University of Missouri psychiatrist who has written numerous studies of student depression and suicide.

"There's simply no way to prove or demonstrate what was really an accident and what was really a suicide," he said.

Spring is always a difficult time for students and faculty members as "burnout" makes it harder to deal with stress, the experts said.

But the hoped-for easing of stress in the economic recovery hasn't happened, they observed.

"Mostly what we're seeing are a lot of seniors with exit anxiety," said Vincent D'Andrea, a Stanford counseling center psychiatrist.

"The seniors are preparing to leave school and enter the job market, and they have all sorts of unanswered questions," he said. "And they see all their communications with friends, counselors and support groups being cut off in the process."

"It's been a busy year," D'Andrea said. Even with predictions that the job market is finally opening up this spring, "depression is still a steady problem."

"The pressure students still feel is to choose a major that will be in demand and pay well, and the desire to maintain good grades have not really leveled off," Allen said.

Nationally, about 19 out of every 100,000 students attempt suicide every year, according to National Institute of Mental Health statistics, making suicide second only to automobile accidents as the leading cause of student deaths.

Several years ago campus counseling experts noted dramatic increases in the numbers of depressed, anxious and suicidal students visiting counseling centers. They theorized that financial aid cutbacks, a sluggish economy, the worst employment market since World War II and increased competition for grades were the main reasons for the increased pressure on students.

Besides an increase in suicides, counselors also observed sharp increases in the number of students with other stress-related problems, such as headaches, depression and eating disorders such as bulimia and anorexia nervosa.

Now, although things aren't getting worse, they don't appear to be improving much, either, the experts said.

A recent Newsweek On Campus poll shows that three of every five students say they suffer from psychological stress.

About two-thirds of the students cited academic pressure, uncertainty about the future and financial worries as the leading causes of stress and anxiety.

The Newsweek poll found one of every eight students had seriously considered suicide while in college. Five percent admitted to actually trying to kill themselves.

As a result of such statistics, many counseling centers have established suicide hotlines, upgraded their counseling services and trained student dormitory supervisors to spot depressed and potentially suicidal students.

Sailing ship found deserted while racing near Bermuda

By The Associated Press

HAMILTON, Bermuda — A British-registered sailing ship racing for Canada was caught in heavy seas off the Bermuda coast, then found abandoned Sunday morning, race organizers said. They said nine people have been rescued and 19 are missing.

One body has been recovered, they said.

Race organizers said ships and aircraft combed the seas 85 miles northeast of the island for survivors from the 67-year-old "tall ship" Marques, which set out from Bermuda in high winds Saturday.

The 117-foot bark, owned by the China Clipper Society, was one of 42 vessels in the race to Halifax, Nova Scotia, according to race organizers.

It was not clear when the ship ran into trouble, but it was found abandoned Sunday, along with an empty lifeboat some distance away, organizers said.

Race organizers, who originally said there were 28 people aboard, said later that there had been 29, including a young child. They said the crew consists of 13 Americans, seven Britons, six Antiguans and Barbadians, one Canadian, and one Guyanese.

The organizers said the skipper is American Stuart Finlay and that he, his wife and 15-month-old son were among the missing.

The Finlays were the only people immediately identified by name.

Coast Guard spokesman Johnny Ludlow said "Coast Guard officials in New York were notified by the Rescue Coordination Station in Bermuda about 6:55 a.m. that the sailboat was awash," already partially submerged and sinking fast, Ludlow said.

He said there were 8- to 12- foot seas with "heavy whitecaps."

A three-masted Polish sailboat Zawisa Czarny was in the area and picked up some people from the Marques, Ludlow said.

The race organizers said the Zawisa Czarny, a Polish training ship, was joined in the search by the U.S. Coast Guard vessel Eagle, and the Canadian frigate Assiniboine, which is coordinating operations.

They said three aircraft were also searching the area.

The operation has been hampered by the weather and language difficulties with the Polish ship, which picked up the first distress call, organizers said.

The weather has remained bad, with winds as high as 30 mph at noon Sunday.

Democratic hopefuls debate as California primary nears

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Democratic presidential contenders debated Sunday for the final time in their marathon primary campaign, with front-runner Walter F. Mondale responding forcefully to pursuer Gary Hart's challenge to the legality of his delegate committees.

The session came less than 48 hours before elections in five states determine whether Hart and the Rev. Jesse Jackson can sidetrack Mondale's drive for the nomination.

"I'm not including or excluding anyone," Mondale said. He and Hart — who said he has fundamental disagreements with Jackson on Middle East policy — declined to name anyone who might be chosen for their ticket.

The first question concerned the possibility that Mondale or Hart would choose Jackson as their vice presidential running-mate. Neither man would make a commitment for or against.

Minutes later, speaking of Sen. Hart's allegation that the former vice president violated the law or ethics in using money from so-called delegate committees, Mondale said, "I think he ought to take that back." Mondale said he has gone "clear beyond anything that was necessary" to make sure that he had violated no law.

Hart said, "he knows I didn't" charge that Mondale had engaged in any criminal behavior.

Hart has complained bitterly during the campaign about more than $400,000 that independent delegate committees used to help elect delegates loyal to Mondale. He has called the money and the delegates "tainted."

Mondale has established a $400,000 escrow account to repay the money, much of which came from political action committees.

Mondale has been predicting he will win the majority of the delegates at stake in California and New Jersey on Tuesday and will have the nomination locked up after all the votes are counted. New Mexico, South Dakota and West Virginia also hold primaries the same day. Hart says he will stay in the race no matter what the outcome.

The 60-minute debate was sponsored and broadcast by NBC News and moderated by anchorman Tom Brokaw. In California, the debate was to be telecast later in the evening because of broadcast commitments to sport events.

On running mates, Mondale said he has promised to consider minority and women candidates, and said the selection of a vice president could be the most important decision a president makes. He praised the deliberative process by which Jimmy Carter chose him as his running mate.

The issue of a possible Jackson vice presidency has become important in California, where many Jewish voters are thought reluctant to support Hart because he said earlier in the campaign he might consider Jackson as a running mate. Hart said two weeks ago he would consider the civil rights leader if he changed his position on the Middle East.

Jackson, making the opening comments of the debate, said it was "presumptuous" for Hart even to talk about a list of possible running mates.

In the week before the debate, which was being moderated by Tom Brokaw, there were mixed signals on whether the session would be a brawl or a love fest.

Mondale was on the attack against Hart on Saturday, but the Colorado senator has generally avoided responding in kind. Jackson has been critical of both his rivals.

But pressure also was building within the party to unite and concentrate on trying to defeat President Reagan in November.

Recent debates in Pennsylvania and Texas were largely free of strong personal attacks.

This year, the candidates debated in Iowa, New Hampshire, Illinois, New York, Georgia, Pennsylvania and Texas, and Mondale carried all of those states except New Hampshire.

Police kill 1, arrest 14 following drug inquiry

By The Associated Press

JUNCTION CITY — Police who fanned out to make arrests at the end of an 18-month drug investigation Sunday accidentally shot and killed a man as they frisked him before searching his home, officials said.

The victim, whose name was withheld pending notification of relatives, was shot in the back, according to U.S. Attorney Ben Burgess.

The police officer whose gun accidentally discharged was not identified.

"The individual thrust back against the arresting officer and the officer fell to the floor, accidentally discharging his firearm, a .357 Magnum revolver," Burgess said in a statement.

The victim was pronounced dead at Geary County Community Hospital, Burgess said.

Geary County Attorney Steve Opat said his preliminary investigation showed the shooting was accidental. Officials said a "substantial" amount of drugs was seized as police and drug agents swept down on a prominent neighborhood in Junction City. Police were armed with 14 arrest warrants and 13 search warrants.

Officials declined to say what kinds and how much drugs were seized until an inventory was completed.

Individuals arrested in the case were expected to appear before a U.S. Magistrate in Topeka on Monday for arraignment, officials said.

The investigation was planned to end with the purchase of a kilo of cocaine for $70,000, Burgess said.

The "buy-bust" could not "be satisfactorily completed," said Burgess, declining to say if the cocaine was among the drugs seized.

"Except for the unfortunate death, it is an example of the accomplishment that can be achieved through the combined resources of city, state and federal agencies," said a statement signed by Burgess, Opat, Police Chief Jerry Smith and Kansas Bureau of Investigation Director Thomas Kelly.

Intercession attracts students for intensive 3-week classes

By JUDI WRIGHT
Campus Editor

Intercession is a time for students to intensively pursue a course during a three-week period without the hassles of other classes or campus activities.

For the past three weeks, May 14 to June 1, approximately 440 students took part in 36 classes offered during the spring intercession. Intercession courses offered up to three credits each and classes generally met three hours a day — usually in the morning.

The early figures for this intercession showed that there were 388 students enrolled as of May 18 — one week into intercession. Of this total, 351 were undergraduate enrollments. The class sizes ranged from 63 students (Women in Theatre) to one student in Advanced Field Studies which was taught in conjunction with the instructor's research study.

Students enrolled in the spring intercession paid $29 per undergraduate credit hour and $45 per graduate credit. The fees are set by the Kansas Board of Regents and are the same for both Kansas residents and non-residents.

Elizabeth Vallance, director of academic outreach for continuing education, said most students take intercession for fun or to receive the credits that they need to graduate early or on time.

"Most of the classes help the undergraduate to fulfill basic requirements or elective requirements for their majors," she said. "History classes are always popular and they're no problem to fill because they help students to meet humanity requirements."

Vallance said the first intercession offered at K-State was in January of 1971 and since then the program has been offered both in the winter and the spring with the number of courses offered ranging between 35 and 60.

"In 1976, K-State's intercession peaked with 50 courses being offered and an enrollment of more than 800 — double that of this year's figures," Vallance said.

The type and number of courses offered depends upon the willingness of both the faculty and the students to sacrifice three weeks of their usual summer break, she said.

To help better the program, a survey was given to all people enrolled in intercession this past winter and the results help to explain why people take intercession and why they choose the classes they do.

The winter survey, returned by 60 percent, or approximately 300 people enrolled in intercession, showed that 88 percent took intercession for undergraduate credit. Five percent of the people were taking courses to fulfill basic requirements, while 69 percent said they took intercession classes to meet elective requirements.

Music, skits highlight Fun Festival

Cotton candy, popcorn, ice cream and soda booths lined the Little Apple's downtown streets as Downtown Manhattan Inc. sponsored its third annual Fun Festival Saturday.

Local performers and nationally-known talent created a carnival atmosphere as each entertained area residents with performances featured on stages and sidewalks from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. The stages were located at the Burger King Plaza, North Fourth Street and on the Riley County Courthouse steps.

Stage entertainment changed every half hour and included everything from skits performed by mimes and comedians to band music played by the students of Manhattan High School and the 1984 Kansas Lions Club All State Band. Clowns were also present, along with the children's beloved character, Winnie the Pooh.

The Lions Clubs of Kansas started the downtown event with a parade at 10 a.m. which featured the Lions State Band.

The Riley County Historical Society offered walking tours throughout the downtown area for interested patrons.

U.S. must avoid Mideast military conflict

Ronald Reagan, in the midst of an election year, is faced with, potentially, his most difficult foreign policy issue. The 44-month war between Iran and Iraq — once a war between two Middle East states — is developing quickly into a conflict having global implications.

The bombing of oil tankers by both Iran and Iraq threatens to stop the flow of oil coming from the Persian Gulf — fuel valuable to the economies of Western countries. Hoping to involve Western nations in his country's fight against the Iranians, Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein has bombed 27 tankers since Feb. 27. In retaliation, Ayathullah Ruhollah Khomeini has also involved Iran in the attacks.

While these attacks have not, as yet, affected oil supplies, Western nations are becoming concerned over the recent Persian Gulf events. President Reagan has vowed the United States and other European countries will never allow the supply of oil coming from the region to be stopped.

With this pledge, Reagan threatens to involve the United States in another foreign policy fiasco similar to his Lebanon and Central America mistakes. Already the United States has seven ships, including the aircraft carriers Kitty Hawk and America, in the Persian Gulf area waiting to be plunged into the Middle East war.

The U.S.'s closest ally in the region, Saudi Arabia, has, so far, refused any assistance by U.S. troops in keeping the gulf open. With one of the most modern and well-trained armies in the Middle East — trained and supplied by the United States — Saudi Arabia has said it is capable of taking care of its own affairs.

The United States has already sold the Saudis 200 shoulder-fired, heat-seeking Stinger missiles having a range of three miles. A sale of 1,200 Stinger missiles to Saudi Arabia and Jordan had before been stopped by Congress, but Reagan used his emergency powers to complete the missile sale.

With this move, the president has taken the first step in getting the United States deeper into the Middle East situation. Undeterred by his failed attempt to rectify the Lebanon situation, he seems more than willing to risk the lives of U.S. servicemen again.

It is vital that the Persian Gulf is kept open. While the United States has cut much of its dependency on Middle East oil and has ample reserves to weather any cutoff of fuel from the region, many other Western nations would be crippled by any stoppage.

But regardless of the importance of maintaining the flow of oil from the Mideast, the United States needs to avoid any military involvement in the area. Through diplomatic channels and continued backing of Saudi Arabia, the United States is more than capable of staying out of the conflict militarily.

However, President Reagan has shown a willingness for war in his administration that can not be ignored. In his latest press conference, Reagan assessed the chance of U.S. military involvement in the region as "very slight." But in the wake of the Marine deaths in Lebanon, Reagan must be convinced that the chance of more U.S. casualties in the Middle East should not be slight but should be nonexistent.

Summer Collegian sets editorial policy

The Kansas State Collegian is the official paper of the K-State student body. News stories do not reflect the opinions of the editor and her staff. Issues and events concerning students, faculty and staff are priorities for Collegian coverage.

Editorial policy is determined by the Collegian Editorial Board. Editorial positions are determined by agreement of a majority of board members. Columns reflect only the opinion of the writer.

Reader input is welcomed by the Collegian staff. Guest columns must be at least two double-spaced typewritten pages. Columns may be submitted between noon and 5 p.m. Monday through Thursday in Kedzie Hall 116. The columns must be signed, and the Collegian reserves the right to refuse any column.

Letters to the editor will be accepted between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m. Monday through Thursday. The writer's name, classification, major, student identification number and telephone number must be included. Only one name will be published with each letter, and the number of other signers will be included. Letters should not exceed 300 words.

Letters containing libelous material will not be printed. If several letters on one subject are received, the Collegian reserves the right to select representative letters. Letters may be edited for style or space reasons.

Manhattan offers much to summer residents—

CHANUTE — Welcome to summer school.

If this is your first experience with Manhattan during the summer, you are in for a treat. If you're a veteran, you know what to expect, so help the new folks out.

You're probably wondering why I'm writing about Manhattan when my column's dateline is Chanute. Hang on. I'll explain later.

I spent last summer as Collegian editor. I had a great time attending summer school and living in Manhattan. There are so many things Manhattan offers its summer residents, it's hard to know where to start.

Since this is the University's newspaper, let's begin with the University. The first thing you'll probably notice is the absence of people. There will be about one-third of the normal population in Manhattan and K-State during the summer. What does that mean? Uncrowded classrooms. More time to chat with a professor. Great class discussion opportunities. Fewer people to fight over needed materials.

What about cultural events? Let's start with the Summer Repertory Theatre. You won't see better entertainment anywhere. Add to this the low ticket prices, an air-conditioned Purple Masque Theatre and three great plays, and you'll discover one of the pleasures of attending summer school.

Looking for other cultural events? Check the Union for displays and occasional performances. Check the Collegian for announcements, also. Walk through the campus — you might discover an unannounced concert or play.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

The campus will play host to a number of groups which will be attending various meetings, conventions and education sessions during summer school. Some of the sessions may be open to the public. Give one or more of these a try. You'll have the opportunity to learn about a new subject and meet new people — or maybe see some old friends.

If you haven't explored Manhattan, now is the time to do it. You won't have to fight the crowds found during the regular school year. Manhattan also has a lot to offer its residents during the summer months.

Arts in the Park is a super summer program. Singers, plays and other types of entertainment are offered weekly in City Park, just south of Aggieville. A modern stage and equipment show Manhattan's commitment to this program.

Other cultural events may be held in the city this summer. Check the Collegian for dates and times.

If camping, fishing, hiking and canoeing interest you, you are in the right place. Manhattan is close to Tuttle Creek and Milford reservoirs and many smaller lakes, rivers and streams. Pillsbury Crossing, southeast of town, is also a nice place to have a picnic or party.

You are in a history-laden area. Kansas' first territorial capital is located at Fort Riley, a short 15-minute drive from Manhattan. The Beecher Bible and Rifle Church is just 15 minutes east of town on K-18. The Santa Fe Trail passed through Council Grove, south of Manhattan on K-177. The town is full of historical markers and sites.

I'm not writing this column as part of a public relations campaign for either K-State or Manhattan. I believe it is important to learn about where you are living and the school you are attending and what those places have to offer. Part of your education includes learning about K-State and Manhattan. Summer school offers an opportune time to do so.

Now, for the reason my column is being written in Chanute, 175 miles southeast of Manhattan. I am from Chanute, a town of 10,000 residents. I haven't really spent any time in the town for two years. I decided to come home to look for a summer job and to see my family and friends — something I may not be able to do during the summer again.

Law school awaits me in the fall. I don't know what future summers will hold, so I decided to come back to Chanute for this summer.

I will maintain my contact with the University community this summer through my weekly column. I hope the dateline changes occasionally, because I want to travel and write about what I will have seen and experienced this summer.

I plan to visit Manhattan a few times this summer, so I hope to see you sometime. Until I do, go out and learn about K-State and Manhattan. You might be able to tell me about a place or event I missed in this column.

Judge clarifies DUI diversion

Editor,

I was pleased some time ago to be interviewed by your reporter Tona Turner. Her story in the May 5 issue of the Collegian which dealt with the offense of driving under the influence of alcohol and drugs was very good. In that story there was discussion of the use of diversion in DUI cases. It is my experience that diversion is a concept which is not generally understood and I am writing to perhaps clarify the concept.

In a DUI case the defendant may submit to the prosecutor a request to be placed on diversion or the prosecutor may offer to the defendant the opportunity to be placed on diversion. In any event, if diversion is to be granted, the prosecutor and defendant enter into an agreement which provides that the prosecution of the case will be held in abeyance for a period of time while the defendant complies with certain requirements of the diversion agreement. If all those requirements are met, then the charge is dismissed. The diversion agreement must include a requirement that the defendant pay a fine of at least $200, or perform community service in lieu of the fine. The agreement must also contain a requirement that the defendant enroll in and successfully complete an alcohol and drug safety action program or a treatment program. In addition to these matters which must be included in the agreement there are frequently other requirements imposed as well.

The fact that the defendant has participated in a diversion program is reported on the defendant's driving record. It is reported, not as a conviction, but merely as diversion. This is done so that there is a record of the fact that there has been a diversion. While diversion is not a conviction, it is treated as a conviction in one limited respect. If the defendant is later convicted on another DUI, the court will impose a sentence as if the defendant were convicted of a second offense. Diversion definitely has a place in the legal system and I favor its continued use. However, the reporter's statement that I favor "increasing the number of diversion cases" is incorrect.

I am very happy to see that the Collegian has an interest in keeping the public informed about the problem of driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs. Last year there were 290 arrests in Riley County for the offense of driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs (180 in Manhattan Municipal Court and 110 in Riley County District Court). I think the magnitude of the problem is clear. I hope that the news media will continue to bring this problem to the attention of the public.

Carter donates home for park

COLUMBUS, Ga. — Former President Jimmy Carter says he's donating his Plains home to the government as part of a historical park that will include a museum depicting his early life.

"The Parks Service has already identified the historic places in Plains, and Rosalynn and I have decided to donate our home to the federal government so it can be incorporated into the plan," Carter said in an interview published in Sunday's Columbus Ledger and Columbus Enquirer.

Carter said he will retain a life interest in the property and will continue to live there, similar to the arrangement of Lady Bird Johnson at her home in Johnson City, Texas.

Plains officials have been talking with the federal government for three years about a plan for the town, said Mayor Boze Godwin.

The museum, Godwin said, could be a boost to the community, which has seen tourist traffic dwindle considerably since Carter left office.

Carter said work on the project would begin in earnest after his planned presidential library in Atlanta is completed.

Western novelist defends book

LOS ANGELES — Novelist Louis L'Amour gallops away from the West in his latest book and charges headlong into medieval Europe and the Levant.

For 30 years, the novelist, now in his mid 70s, has depicted life on the Western frontier, from table-smashing saloon brawls to the peaceful hacienda life on the range. But his latest work, "The Walking Drum," takes place in 12th century Europe and the Middle East.

Some of his fans may be disappointed, but L'Amour said his 89th book is still about a frontier and relies on historical accuracy — a staple throughout his writing career.

"I consider all my novels historical," L'Amour said. "My stories are frontier stories. A frontier is the point where the known meets the unknown, in science, in medicine, in anything."

Since L'Amour's first book, "Hondo," came out 30 years ago, 145 million copies of his works have been printed. Each of his 88 books has sold a million copies or more, according to his publisher, Bantam Books.

Town invites pop singer Jackson

WAHOO, Neb. — There may not be seating for more than 300 and, with a six-member police force, crowd control could be a bit of a problem. But that hasn't stopped this tiny southeast Nebraska town from inviting singer Michael Jackson for a visit.

"It's a serious invitation," said Sherry Treptow of the Wahoo Chamber of Commerce.

Well, maybe not so serious, she conceded. "But who knows? Maybe he'll decide he wants to come."

To sweeten the invitation, she said the town of 3,555 will declare Michael Jackson Day on July 13, the day of the proposed concert. Local merchants will offer presents such as sequins for his glove.

Convention season begins

Youth groups visit campus

By JUDI WRIGHT
Campus Editor

The majority of the students had left for summer break two weeks earlier and life on campus had slowed down until the campus was revived by three groups — the Kansas Lions Club, the Kansas Future Farmers of America and the Kansas 4-H — who held state conventions at K-State during the week of May 28 through June 2.

The largest of these three groups was the 4-H, numbering 1,750 members, leaders, parents and extension agents. The participants took part in four different programs May 30-June 1 with the main programs being 4-H Discovery Days and the 4-H Ambassadors Program.

Discovery Days is a program of classes using K-State faculty and volunteers from the community to teach 4-Hers anything from simple crafts to more technical subjects such as animal science and animal behavior studies. The 4-Hers attended the sessions that best satisfied their individual interests.

The Ambassadors Program involved a number of workshops on communication skills. Kansas has 25-30 counties that have 4-H ambassadors who travel within their given area promoting 4-H.

A few select 4-H members were involved in special recognition luncheons and tours as part of the 4-H Congress awards program. These members, through outstanding 4-H work, have earned a trip to Washington, D.C., to participate in the National 4-H Congress later in June.

Several other 4-Hers spent some of their time at K-State in interviews which will eventually determine 15 state finalists in 4-H award programs. Participants stayed at Haymaker, Ford and West halls.

The state FFA convention was also held on campus from May 30 through June 1 with 123 FFA chapters from across the state represented for a total of about 900 members and leaders.

On Wednesday the FFA members were involved in public speaking and parliamentary procedure contests while the main convention sessions took place on Thursday and Friday with award presentations and the election of new officers.

Keynote speakers for the convention included Gov. John Carlin, Speaker of the Kansas House of Representatives Mike Hayden and National FFA President Ron Wineinger.

FFA's highest state awards, the Kansas Star Farmer award and the Kansas Star Agri-businessman award, were also announced during the convention. Matt Wineinger of Marion was named Kansas Star Farmer and Todd Stritske from Caney was named the Kansas Star Agri-businessman.

State officers for next year were also determined at the convention and all the elected officers will be students at K-State next fall. They are: Daryl Yarrow, Clay Center, president; Michelle Benoit, Mankato, vice president; Wine-inger, secretary; Jeff Ochampaugh, Plainville, treasurer; Stacey Campbell, Atchison, reporter; and Kim Bueth, Centre, sentinel.

Besides the 4-H and FFA groups, the Kansas Lions Club also sponsored its state convention June 1-2. The main events of this convention was a parade in downtown Manhattan Saturday morning and later a public concert in McCain Auditorium at 5 p.m.

Earlier in the week 230 high school band members comprising the 1984 Kansas Lions All State Band arrived on campus and began rehearsing for the concert that concluded the convention Saturday night. The musicians came from throughout the state and were sponsored by 160 Kansas Lions Clubs. The band was under the direction of Lawrence Norvell, director of beginning band students for the Manhattan elementary schools.

K-State department of music faculty members who were named section leaders were Stan Finck, assistant professor, assistant director; Frank Sidorfsky, associate professor, clarinets; Sara Funkhouser, instructor, oboes and bassoons; Paul Shull, associate professor, trumpets; and Jack Flower, professor, French horns.

Approximately 100 students of the group have qualified for membership in the International Lions Band and will join others from throughout the world to play at the International Lions Club Convention in San Francisco in July.

Soviet talks likely to resume

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration's arms control director says the Soviets are likely willing to move ahead on three treaty negotiations before the November elections, but holds out little hope they will return to the bargaining table over strategic and intermediate-range nuclear weapons.

The nuclear talks have been in suspension for more than six months, following the deployment of U.S. Pershing 2 and cruise missiles in Western Europe last December, and relations between the superpowers are at a low ebb.

Kenneth L. Adelman, director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, gave his views on the administration's record and the outlook for agreements with the Soviets in a recent interview with The Associated Press.

Here are excerpts from that interview:

Q: Do you foresee negotiations with the Russians before the elections?

A: Yes. I would think that the Soviets would want to move ahead on the banning of chemical weapons and on the conventional arms talks. They may want to move ahead on the confidence-building measures that we have in the Stockholm (disarmament) talks. It seems unlikely they would move ahead on the nuclear arms talks.

Q: You don't see any negotiations on nuclear weapons until next year, after the presidential elections?

A: I think that's probably right. I think the Soviets are looking at three things.

One is the U.S. elections and how they can get Ronald Reagan out of the White House. I think that is probably overplayed in our estimations.

No. 2 is the amount of internal dissension, weakness, confusion in the Soviet decision-making structure, in the process. I think we tend to underestimate the importance of this factor.

Third is the continual question in Soviet eyes on cohesion of NATO and what they can do...to help break off Western Europe from the United States. To the extent that they can continue to do that on the Intermediate Nuclear Forces (Euromissiles) issue, that will cause them to stay away (from negotiations) longer. To the extent they are blocked from doing that in the INF channel they will come back to the negotiations sooner.

Q: Hasn't U.S. strategy proved to be wrong, saying when the Soviets see the United States is serious about deploying missiles they will negotiate?

A: The way I always said it was that without both tracks of the deployment going forward (negotiations and installation), there was no chance of having results in arms control. (But) both tracks going forward did not assure you that there was going to be a success in arms control. And anybody who told you that you could take this path and there will be successful arms control is just whistling "Dixie."

You can never predict what the other side, the Soviet Union, is going to do with any great degree of certainty on arms control issues.

All you can do is — and what we have an obligation to do and what we have been successful in doing — is to create the climate for there to be successful arms control negotiations if the Soviets are willing, and we've done that.

Q: But if U.S. deployment goes on, might there never be nuclear weapons control?

A: That's always been possible.

Q: You think we overestimate the importance of our elections on their behavior?

A: I think what has been overplayed is the estimation that the Soviets are making a lot of their moves in order to affect U.S. domestic political considerations. I think they do pretty poorly in that realm.

I am not terribly sure if this was 1985, that it wouldn't be pretty much the same situation.

Q: Are the steps the Soviets have taken, their counter-measures, menacing?

A: They are menacing in the same way they have been menacing for a good number of years. They are not a quantum leap to a more dangerous world. They are marginal.

Q: Are we reaching dangerous new plateaus?

A: I think not. I think the world would be safer and better off if we had successful arms control. I think that we would feel even more safer and more secure with ongoing arms control talks. I myself am always optimistic.

I think we are going to go back to the talks eventually, and the Soviets will realize that it's in their interest to do so.

Caucus represents Asian-Pacific voters

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — When the Democrats meet next month to hammer out a platform at their San Francisco convention, it will mark the political baptism of the country's Asian-Pacific community.

Asian-Pacific Americans say their caucus, one of six officially recognized by the Democrats, is already helping them to build unity and the foundation for a political action fund-raising committee.

"It was long overdue," said China-born Lily Chen, mayor of Monterey Park, Calif., and a member of the Democratic National Committee platform committee. "For the longest time, the Asian Pacifics more or less tagged along with other minorities. Finally the party began to realize that there's a growing number of Asian Pacific population becoming Democrats, and that they do have something to contribute."

"Our parents and grandparents wanted no visibility, but visibility is the name of the game in politics," said Rep. Norman Mineta, D-Calif., one of the Japanese-American community's most prominent members.

The Asian-Pacific Caucus was formally recognized by the Democrats last year, making it one of two new caucuses that will debut at the July presidential nominating convention. The other is the Gay and Lesbian Caucus.

The Asian caucus includes Americans whose heritage is Chinese, Japanese, Korean, Thai, Samoan, Indo-Chinese, Filipino or Pacific islander.

The caucus will ask the convention to adopt a platform that says Asians are tired of being perceived as foreigners. It says the group has become "the scapegoat of many Americans for our country's economic difficulties."

They want more government attention to civil rights laws protecting them, as well as legislation authorizing financial reparations to thousands of people of Japanese ancestry — many of them American citizens — who during World War II were forced into detention camps in the United States.

Their platform also addresses immigration law, bilingual education, minority business assistance, foreign trade policies, and refugee assistance.

"We have to educate the Democratic party leadership that these are essential issues for us," said San Francisco architect Tom Hsieh, chairman and a key founder of the Asian-Pacific Caucus.

Asian Americans are familiar with the financial aspects of politics; they gave well over $2 million to 1980 Democratic candidates, including Jimmy Carter's ill-fated presidential re-election bid, Hsieh said.

But they never achieved the political clout they believed should have flowed from such contributions, he said in a recent interview.

"We found ourselves not particularly sophisticated on issues, or united on a national basis," he said. "I think the Asian-Pacific Americans finally realized that just providing the money, raising the money, and sitting on the sidelines, is not what we want to see."

The 1980 Census listed 3.7 million Asian-Pacific residents in the United States — 1.6 percent of the nation's population, or twice what it was in 1970. Many Asians say their numbers have increased dramatically since the 1980 count.

Traditionally, Asian-Pacific residents, whose average family income is slightly higher than the nation as a whole, have made campaign contributions out of proportion to their numbers. But the proportion of those who vote has been very low, spokesmen said.

"Asian Americans vote with their wallets," said Michael Eng, an immigration attorney who is secretary of the state's Asian-Pacific Caucus, which has 1,000 members.

Barbara Hansberry, the Democratic National Committee staff coordinator for the Asian-Pacific Caucus, said some members of the community have told her that they prefer to remain in the background and not take active political roles.

That has changed as second- and third-generation immigrants have "forced their parents to come out of the closet," in the political arena, said Mineta. While the early immigrants fought for survival in the face of discrimination, later generations "can devote some time to other efforts. Those efforts are in politics."

Eng said many younger Americans see the need to "become involved in the political process." But many are not even registered to vote, he said.

But with the formation of the national caucus and 20 individual state caucuses across the country since last November, Asian leaders expect that to change, said Hsieh. Their goal is to establish caucuses in 30 states that have a significant number of Asian-Pacific groups.

California, which was the only state with its own caucus before last November, has played a major role in forming the national caucus. Hawaii, a state where Asian-Pacific citizens form a majority and Japanese-Americans exert considerable political power, has a well-established political tradition and has not been as active in forming the caucus, caucus leaders said.

Hsieh said the leaders hope to establish a political action fund-raising committee that could raise $500,000 in a few years, mainly from individual contributions.

Kansans favor Reagan as Democrats lose out

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — Most Kansas voters approve of the job President Reagan is doing and favor him over any of his three Democratic challengers, according to a statewide poll conducted by The Wichita Eagle-Beacon.

Forty-four percent of the Kansans polled who were determined likely to vote in the fall election would vote for Reagan no matter whom the Democrats nominate, according to the survey in the Sunday editions of the Eagle-Beacon.

Reagan also would easily defeat each of the three Democratic contenders, the survey showed.

The president would defeat Walter Mondale, 53 percent to 29 percent; Gary Hart, 48 percent to 36 percent; and the Rev. Jesse Jackson, 68 percent to 15 percent.

Eighteen percent were undecided in a Reagan-Mondale race, 16 percent were undecided when Reagan was matched with Hart, and 17 percent could not decide between Reagan and Jackson.

The survey was conducted between May 15 and May 23. A total of 1,068 adult Kansans were polled, and 556 people were identified as likely to vote in November.

Results of the poll had a margin of error of 3 percent. The margin of error among the smaller group of likely voters was 4 percent.

Sixty percent of all those polled approve of the job Reagan is doing, an increase from 59 percent in February and from 57 percent last December.

Among likely voters making less than $10,000 a year, 46 percent approved of Reagan's performance, while 78 percent of those making more than $50,000 approved of the president's work.

Reagan received a favorable job-rating from only 8 percent of the blacks likely to vote. Of Hispanics likely to vote, 33 percent approve, while 63 percent of the whites likely to vote say they approve.

The poll showed 53 percent of the likely Kansas voters believed the economy is better under Reagan than under former President Jimmy Carter. Twenty percent said the economy was worse, and 24 percent believed it is about the same.

In other findings:

—36 percent support Reagan on the deficit; 48 percent do not.

—36 percent support Reagan's Central American policies; 44 percent do not.

—39 percent support Reagan's Middle East policies; 42 percent do not.

—35 percent support Reagan's agricultural policies; 41 percent do not.

Championships end season; 4 'Cats named All-American

Four K-State athletes earned all-American honors as the NCAA Track and Field Championships ended Saturday at Eugene, Ore.

Sophomore Rita Graves led K-State finishers, ending up in a tie for second place in the high jump competition. Graves jumped 6-0½, tying her own school record. She also finished second in the NCAA Indoor Championships.

Pinkie Suggs, Deb Pihl and Ray Hansen also turned in All-American performances, each placing among the top six American finishers in their events.

Suggs, also a sophomore, moved from 10th place on her final throw to end up in fifth place in the shot put competition. Suggs' best effort was a 51-4 toss. Earlier, she failed to qualify for the finals in the discus competition by eight inches with a throw of 160-8.

Pihl, a senior, turned in a personal-best effort in the 3,000-meter run to end up seventh, the sixth American to finish. Pihl led the race with two laps remaining, but faded at the end to finish with a time of 9:09.10.

"She just panicked a little," Coach Steve Miller said. "She got tied up in the emotion of the moment, in the magnitude of the meet and the 10,000 people who were there. She just cracked a little."

Senior Hansen earned all-American status in the javelin competition, finishing 10th in the event. He turned in a throw of 246-1 and was the fifth American finisher. Two years ago Hansen also finished 10th at the NCAA championships.

Two other K-State athletes also competed in the finals. Kenny Harrison, a freshman, placed 10th in the triple jump with a jump of 52-3 while Betsy Silzer placed 14th in the 5,000 meters with a time of 16:51.9.

Four K-Staters failed to gain a place in the finals. In the sprint events Donna King failed to qualify in the 200 meters while Michelle Maxey failed to gain a spot in the 400-meter final. In the 10,000-meter event, Barb Ludovise came up short in qualifying, while in field competition Julie Waage failed to gain a spot in the finals of the javelin event.

In team competition, the University of Oregon men picked up their fifth NCAA championship, topping second place Washington State University by a 113 to 94½ margin. Oregon was led by middle distance runner Joaquim Cruz, who placed first in the 800-meter and 1500-meter run events.

On the women's side, the Florida State University team won its first-ever championship. Led by four first-place finishes by Randy Givens, the Seminoles compiled 145 points to top the second place University of Tennessee's 124 points. Givens won the 100-meter dash and the 200-meter run and was part of Florida State's 400-meter and mile relay winning teams.

The K-State women finished 12th as a team in the meet.

Golfer claims first U.S. win

By The Associated Press

BETHESDA, Md. — Greg Norman's front-running position never was challenged and the Australian import known as "the Great White Shark" cruised to an easy, five-stroke victory Sunday in the Kemper Open Golf Tournament.

Norman, leading by seven shots when the day's play started under overcast skies, needed only a closing round of 73, 1-over par, to maintain a comfortable margin over any would-be contenders.

Over the last 18 holes, no one ever got closer than six shots until Norman bogeyed on the final hole.

Norman, 29, now a resident of Orlando, Fla., and a full-time competitor on the American circuit, scored his first PGA Tour triumph with a 280 total, eight strokes under par on the difficult, 7,173-yard Congressional Country Club course.

The victory was worth $72,000 from the total purse of $400,000 and pushed Norman's winnings for the season to $185,935.

While it was Norman's first American triumph, it was the 30th of his globe-trotting career. Among the 29 international titles he collected before settling in the United States were a pair of World Match Play Championships and an Australian Open.

None came with the ease of this one.

On rounds of 68, 68 and 71, he held overnight leads of two strokes, four and then, after three rounds, seven.

It eliminated any potential drama from the final round. Norman started far in front, stayed far in front and finished far in front. There never was a question of who would win, only by how many strokes.

Kansas City stops Twins again 5-2

By The Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Kansas City has suddenly come alive with the return of "30 to 40 percent" — George Brett and Willie Wilson — of its lineup.

"When you have those two people, you are going to go," said Kansas City Manager Dick Howser after the Royals won their third straight against the Minnesota Twins 5-2 Sunday. "It's not easy facing Brett and Wilson five times a day. You can't express how much these two guys mean. You don't lose 30 to 40 percent of your offense and still win."

Darryl Motley swung a big bat for the Royals, smacking a two-run homer and a solo shot, along with a double.

Wilson extended his hitting streak to seven games and smothered everything hit to center field, while Brett homered for his third consecutive game. Since Wilson returned from a drug suspension and Brett from a knee injury, the Royals are 11-6.

"Brett might lead the league in hitting and Wilson might lead the world in assists and putouts," said Twins Manager Billy Gardner. "Wilson is the best center fielder in baseball. He reminds me of Willie Mays."

Brett said his concentration is the difference in his recent home run surge. "I got tired of trying to hit home runs and I just tried to hit the ball."

Although Brett had a great series, he admitted dreading coming to the Metrodome. "We had thought we had a great road trip and thought it was too bad we had to come to the homerodome. Usually they out-homer us about 10-1. This time they didn't hit any."

All of the Kansas City runs scored on home runs off Frank Viola, 4-6, who pitched his third complete game of the season. Winner Bud Black, 6-3, allowed six hits over seven innings and Joe Beckwith finished up for his first save.

Wildcats sign KC gridder

K-State's football program has added another player, James Wilborn, a 6-foot-1, 180-pound defensive back and wide receiver from Kansas City, Mo. In signing Wilborn, the 'Cats beat out the University of Arkansas, Texas Tech University and Central Missouri State University.

Wilborn, out of Paseo High School in Kansas City, was a first team All-City Interscholastic League player at wide receiver and defensive back and was named the league's most valuable defensive player. Wilborn was also named the league's track athlete of the year, posting times of 47.8 in the 400-meter run and 21.8 in the 200 meters.

"James was certainly one of the best prospects in the city,"

Jerry Boyce, K-State assistant coach, said. "He's versatile and can play a lot of positions, but we're looking at him mainly as a wide receiver."

Cleo Washington, Wilborn's coach at Paseo, also said his former player is an outstanding prospect.

"Even at the Big Eight level he will be able to play well his freshman year," Washington said. "He didn't get as much publicity as some other players, but he played receiver on a team that ran 70 percent of the time. He has all the tools to be a great receiver."

With Wilborn's signing, K-State has inked 27 recruits for the upcoming season.

Lakers romp to 137-104 win, lead Celts 2-1 in NBA series

By The Associated Press

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — Kareem Abdul-Jabbar scored 13 of his 24 points in the third period as Los Angeles overwhelmed Boston with a record 47 points in that quarter as the Lakers beat the Celtics 137-104 Sunday and took a 2-1 lead in the National Basketball Association Championship Series.

The Lakers' Earvin "Magic" Johnson set a record with 21 assists.

Johnson, who also had 14 points and 11 rebounds, broke the Championship Series record of 19 assists set twice by Bob Cousy of the Celtics and once by Walt Frazier of New York.

The Lakers, who play host to Boston in Game 4 of the best-of-seven series Wednesday night, had survived a 14-0 Celtics' first-half spurt by responding with an 18-0 run for a 13-point halftime lead.

Then, Abdul-Jabbar, the NBA's all-time leading scorer, combined with Michael Cooper and Kurt Rambis on a 16-6 streak that put the Lakers ahead 73-52 with 9:15 to go in the third period. The Celtics never got closer than 16.

The Lakers outscored Boston 47-33 in the third period, which ended with Los Angeles ahead 104-79. The 47 points broke the Championship Series record of 46 points for a quarter set by Boston against St. Louis in 1960.

The Lakers and Celtics traded fast starts in the first two games in Boston, and on Sunday it was Los Angeles' turn again.

James Worthy had two outside jumpers and two swooping layups and Rambis made three baskets inside as the Lakers pulled away to an 18-4 lead midway through the first period.

The Celtics, who missed 11 of their first 13 shots, narrowed the deficit to 20-15 before McAdoo helped the Lakers rebuild their margin to 29-18 with seven points in 1:51.

But Bird, who had 12 first-period points, hit eight as the Celtics scored 14 straight points at the end of the first quarter and the beginning of the second to put Boston ahead 32-29.

The lead changed hands four more times in the next 89 seconds before the Celtics scored six straight for a 40-35 margin with 7:20 to go in the half.

Boston didn't score in the next 5½ minutes, however, missing eight straight shots while Los Angeles scored 18 consecutive points to lead 53-40. It was 57-46 at halftime.

U.S. netters move on

By The Associated Press

PARIS — John McEnroe and Chris Evert Lloyd struggled on Center Court at Roland Garros Stadium Sunday, but came through their respective fourth-round matches to move into the quarterfinals of the French Open tennis championships.

McEnroe, bidding to become the first American to win the men's singles title since 1955, took three hours, 50 minutes to get past Spanish clay court specialist Jose Higuera 6-4, 7-6 (7-5), 3-6, 6-3.

Lloyd, the defending women's champion, lost the first set against Manuela Maleeva before posting a 3-6, 6-3, 6-2 victory and gaining revenge for her straight-set defeat at the hands of the talented Bulgarian at Perugia, Italy, last week.

Lloyd's victory was her 48th — the most ever by a woman. Only Bjorn Borg, a six-time champion, has won more matches, 49. Martina Navratilova, the women's top seed, also advanced to the quarterfinals, taking just 45 minutes to overwhelm West Germany's Claudia Kohde-Kilsch 6-0, 6-1.

Sunday's play, interrupted twice by rain, saw Melissa Brown, a 16-year-old amateur from Scarsdale, N.Y., upset sixth-seeded Zina Garrison of Houston 6-3, 3-6, 6-3.

Also posting victories on the slow red clay courts of Roland Garros Stadium were No. 8 Kathy Horvath of Largo, Fla., No. 3 Hana Mandlikova of Czechoslovakia, No. 15 Carling Bassett of Canada, Lisa Bonder of Saline, Mich., and Camille Benjamin of Bakersfield, Calif.

In the men's singles, winners Sunday included fifth-seeded Jimmy Arias of Buffalo, N.Y., who will face McEnroe, and No. 9 Henrik Sundstrom of Sweden.

Grocery prices drop slightly, continuing downward trend

By The Associated Press

Grocery prices dropped 0.8 percent during May, according to a monthly Associated Press market-basket survey.

Egg prices plummeted, dropping to below $1 per dozen in seven of the 13 cities surveyed. Beef and pork moved higher.

The latest decline followed modest 0.1 percent dips in the previous two months, and dramatic increases in January and February.

The marketbasket bill decreased in six cities, falling an average of 4.5 percent. It rose an average 2.8 percent in seven cities.

"It's a combination of lower farm prices and the lack of growth in the economy," said economist Michael K. Evans.

Evans, head of Evans Economics in Washington, D.C., noted that farm prices have declined, "and apparently, a good part of it showed up in retail prices."

Prices farmers received for their crops in May fell 1.4 percent from April, while farmers' costs were unchanged, the Agriculture Department said last week. Evans also attributed the marketbasket tab decline to "a return to normalcy of these prices," which he said were artificially inflated in January and February by extremely cold weather.

"Food prices are fairly sensitive to the way the economy is going," he added. "We've seen all sorts of evidence that the economy had slowed down sharply because of higher interest rates. People are being a little more price conscious about their shopping."

But Donald Ratajczak, an economist at Georgia State University in Atlanta, said: "The slowing down is just very, very recent. That's not going to affect prices significantly. I think you're dealing with conditions in the agricultural markets. Some of the poultry and other items are starting to weaken on the farm side and its starting to pass through."

It is also likely that the replacement of flocks that had been decimated by the avian flu several months ago has depressed egg prices, Evans said.

The largest marketbasket jump came in Providence, R.I.: 6.1 percent. The biggest decline — 13.8 percent — occurred in Salt Lake City, partly because of an extraordinary decline in the price of sugar, which had soared in April.

The Associated Press drew up a random list of 15 commonly purchased food and non-food items, checked the price at one supermarket in each of 13 cities on March 1, 1973, and has rechecked on or about the start of each succeeding month. One item, chocolate chip cookies, was dropped from the list because the manufacturer discontinued the package size used in the survey.

No attempt was made to weigh the AP survey results according to population density or in terms of what percent of a family's actual grocery outlay each item represents.

The day of the week on which the check was made varied depending on the month. Standard brands and sizes were used when available. If the requested size and brand was not available on March 1, 1973, a comparable substitute was selected. Items temporarily out of stock on one of the survey dates being compared were not included in the overall total.

The AP did not try to compare actual prices from city to city — to say, for example, that eggs cost more in one area than another.

Disposal of prime land forces decision

By The Associated Press

CANTON, Mass. — It's a classic public policy dilemma: Should the governor seize 55 of the last remaining acres of open space in greater Boston, or let a growing high-technology firm complete work on a spectacular new headquarters?

At stake is the future of the historic, but abandoned, Prowse Farm in suburban Canton, just south of Boston, a pastoral stretch of woods and meadows that abuts the 8,000-acre Blue Hills public reservation.

Also at stake are the fragile relations between Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, a liberal Democrat, and the booming high-technology industry, as well as his links to the vocal environmental lobby — led, in this case, by former Boston Celtics basketball star Dave Cowens.

Dukakis, who says he wants to be sure the state moves in an environmentally sensitive manner, has promised a decision next week.

The issue was forced on May 22 when the state's highest court reversed a seven-year succession of court decisions and ruled that the Metropolitan District Commission, a state parks agency, has the power to buy the land over the objections of the town of Canton, which supports the project.

The dispute began in 1975, when Martha Peabody Prowse died and left the ramshackle horse farm — where businessman Malcolm Forbes once bred trotting horses — to her nieces and nephews.

Cowens bid more than $250,000 to buy the land for a horse farm, but the offer was refused.

Enter the Codex Corporation.

A data communications company that started out as "three guys over a tailor shop in Cambridge" in the mid-1960s, Codex was outgrowing its space in nearby Mansfield as sales increased more than 20 percent a year.

"We said, ultimately, we're going to grow," company president Jim Storey explained during an interview.

In 1977, Codex offered $1 million. The offer was accepted.

Storey said Codex wanted a "prestigious" headquarters site, preferably fronting on Route 128, the highway ringing Boston that is known as "America's Technology Highway." Route 128 is the address of dozens of computer, electronics, research and design and other white-collar firms.

In Canton, despite a warm welcome from the town government, Codex has faced seven years of court proceedings, expensive concessions and guarantees while trying to locate 1,000 white-collar workers with an annual payroll of $22 million.

"This could only happen in Massachusetts," Storey said.

"Nobody will ever try this again."

In an elaborate "conservation covenant," Codex promised to leave 80 percent of the land in agricultural use and agreed to maintain it as a working farm open to the public, at no cost to taxpayers.

Codex held a national architectural design competition to create a "signature" building that would blend with the site. Plans call for a three-story brick building with slate roof and solar heating. Storey said he had personally selected trees that would be planted on the site.

The company also restored the Prowse farmhouse.

The plan won approval from town officials and the Legislature. The company won a court injunction barring the MDC from seizing the property, and was upheld on appeal.

"We thought we were out of the woods then," Storey said.

But, last fall, state officials argued their final appeal, at the request of the MDC. Last week the Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled that MDC and the state could seize the land without approval of local officials.

That ruling set the stage for the "tough political decision" Dukakis says he now faces. Since the governor controls the MDC, whose members he appoints, he can influence how the land will be used.

On one hand, Codex has title to the land and has spent over $11 million on renovating the historic house and barn, landscaping and raising the steel skeleton of the headquarters building. Storey argues that the state can't afford to buy the property and that Dukakis cannot afford to alienate business.

Case tests legality of analysis process

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Supreme Court was asked Monday to decide whether a person arrested for drunken driving should be permitted to talk with a lawyer before deciding to take a blood alcohol test.

At issue in the case is the grounds under which people can refuse to take the test and not lose their driving privileges.

The case stems from a decision by the Sedgwick County District Court to restore the driver's license of Ronald C. Moser of Wichita, who was arrested for drunken driving on June 24, 1982.

Moser declined to take a chemical breath test to measure his blood alcohol content, saying he first wanted to speak with his attorney. As a result, the state Division of Motor Vehicles suspended his driving privileges.

Under Kansas law, refusal to take the test results in suspension of a driver's license for at least 120 days and possibly up to a year.

Brian Cox, attorney for the Department of Revenue, argued that there is no right to an attorney in a drunken driving case as it relates to the civil law issue of license suspension. He urged the court to reverse the Wichita judge and suspend Moser's license.

Moser's attorney, Craig Robinson of Wichita, said his client decided not to take the breath test because of statements by the arresting police officer who advised Moser of his "Miranda" rights, including the right to consult with a lawyer.

Robinson urged the high court to uphold the Wichita judge's ruling in favor of his client, saying the justices should do so from "a fairness standpoint."

The Wichita attorney conceded, however, that there is no constitutional right to an attorney in a drunken driving case as it relates to the potential suspension of a driver's license. The right to an attorney, he noted, applies only to the criminal proceeding of prosecution for drunken driving.

Early last month, the Kansas Court of Appeals ruled that people arrested for drunken driving have a constitutional right to consult with a lawyer before deciding whether to take the blood alcohol test.

Both Cox and Robinson said the Court of Appeals ruling did not apply to Moser's case.

In another drunken driving case Monday, the Supreme Court was asked to decide whether people can change their minds after once refusing to take a chemical breath test.

The question of whether there is a right to consult with an attorney also was raised in the second case, which stemmed from a decision by the Barton County District Court to restore the driver's license of a Great Bend man.

Reagan calls for compromise

By The Associated Press

DUBLIN, Ireland — President Reagan, declaring "America is prepared for peace," announced Monday he will consider a Soviet proposal to renounce the use of force in Europe if Moscow agrees to consider specific Western proposals to reduce the chance of war on the continent.

Stressing the United States has renounced the use of force many times in the past, Reagan declared, "If discussions on reaffirming the principle not to use force, a principle in which we believe so deeply, will bring the Soviet Union to negotiate agreements which will give concrete new meaning to that principle, we will gladly enter into such discussions."

With thousands of protesters a half block away, Reagan delivered the main policy address of his 10-day European tour to a joint session of the Irish Parliament.

Its tone seemed designed to ease European concern about U.S. foreign policy and, as Reagan said, to "reach out to our adversaries."

But in the first reaction from Moscow, a commentator for the Soviet news agency Novosti dismissed Reagan's remarks, saying the American president "has again showed himself to be a master of speaking much, but saying little."

"In essence," wrote Vladimir Alexeev for the No. 2 Soviet news agency, "he said nothing that was new or which could be interpreted as meaning that the United States was ready to reconsider its intransigent stand on the Euromissile issue, which has disrupted the Soviet-American negotiations in Geneva."

Though U.S. officials acknowledged it was not a major new initiative, they said it was a change, since the administration had opposed Soviet efforts to push for such a treaty on the grounds that it was a public relations stunt.

The speech was the first by an American president to the full parliament, known as the Oireachtas when the Senate and Dail meet together, since John F. Kennedy addressed the body in 1963.

Reagan's appearance was boycotted by a number of legislators, and three members — two of them from the socialist Workers Party — tried to interrupt Reagan in the Leinster House chamber. They stalked out when they were shouted down.

"I think it has been made clear to Reagan that there is a strong body of opinion in this country opposed to his policies," said Tony Gregory, an independent socialist who was the third person to walk out. "We stood up to be counted."

The president had been warned in advance by Irish Prime Minister Garret Fitzgerald to expect the protest, and he drew applause when he remarked that there are some countries "where representatives would not have been able to speak as they have here."

Outside the chamber, several thousand dissidents demonstrated against U.S. policies in Central America and toward the Soviet Union. There were chants of "Arrest Ronald Reagan."

After flying from Ireland to London for talks with Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher on Tuesday, Reagan was asked about the reception he had received in Dublin. "No one threw anything at me," he quipped.

His spokesman, Larry Speakes, told reporters aboard Air Force One en route to London the demonstrations that dogged the president on his four-day visit to Ireland had been expected.

The spokesman also told reporters the purpose of Reagan's speech was "to show we now have an established foreign policy.... We've made these overtures to the Soviets in various forms. We're flexible and we want to enter genuine negotiations."

Reagan's speech also called on the Soviet Union to return to the nuclear arms negotiating table.

He reiterated his offer to "halt, even reverse," the deployment of an eventual 572 medium-range nuclear missiles if the United States and the Soviet Union could agree to an arms pact.

But Reagan's offer to consider the Soviet proposal to renounce the use of force in Europe was unexpected. The Kremlin's offer, like Western "confidence-building" proposals and a treaty to eliminate chemical weapons, is pending before the Stockholm conference on European security, which began Jan. 17 to try to reduce tensions and avoid military conflicts in Europe.

A White House official said some Western diplomats believe Moscow would be more inclined to return to the negotiating table on talks aimed at reducing nuclear weapons if the United States were willing to endorse its treaty renouncing force.

Reagan complained that the Soviets have been ignoring Western proposals at the conference, including suggestions to limit the size of military maneuvers in Europe and to exchange data to give NATO nations and the Warsaw Pact countries information about each other.

In his speech, Reagan also said positive steps by Moscow in the area of human rights "would be considered by the United States a significant signal."

Speaking to the Irish concern about his policies in Central America — apparently engendered by reports from Irish missionaries there — Reagan said his mission in the region was only to encourage democracy and to avoid violence.

After the speech, Reagan and his wife, Nancy, gave a luncheon in honor of Irish President Patrick J. Hillery at Deerfield, the 200-year-old residence of the U.S. ambassador.

After lunch, the president bid a sentimental farewell to the nation from which his great-grandfather, Michael, emigrated more than a century ago.

"Your warmth has touched our hearts," Reagan told Hillery during an airport departure ceremony.

Construction increases as interest rates drop

The construction of apartment complexes in Manhattan hit an all-time high this spring, despite K-State's drop in enrollment.

Figures show that nine permits were sold in April alone for the construction of 124 multi-family living units.

Dan Woellhof, city building official, cited the drop in interest rates as the cause of the increase in residential construction.

"Investors are doing it (investing in real estate) for sheer investments and tax breaks," Woellhof said. "Real estate is a sound investment — especially in this town, because it is a university town. Students cannot go out and look for a place to live and have a down payment. And, of course, there is Fort Riley, which brings in people to Manhattan."

There is also an increase in the amount of commercial construction in Manhattan.

Apartment complexes are scheduled to be constructed on Vattier, Kearney and Lee streets and Anderson and Hunting avenues. D & R Construction Co. is building in the Knoxberry area on the east side of Manhattan and in the Snowbird area on the west side of town.

The company is also contracted to build Nautilus Towers, a fitness, retail and office complex at 11th and Moro streets in Aggieville. It is scheduled for completion on Aug. 15.

Construction of a Bonanza restaurant in east Manhattan (located by Wal-Mart) is also on D & R's work schedule.

The Osborne Construction Co. is contracted for work on the apartment complexes going up on Lee Street and Hunting Avenue. Other housing units under construction with Osborne are the duplexes located in Meadowlark Hills off Kimball Avenue.

Osborne is also contracted with the city for the construction of the fire station located on Denison and Kimball avenues, in addition to the Union Bus Station located on Rosencutter and Stag Hill roads.

A Sub & Stuff is under construction at 1200 Moro St. by Abbott Construction Co.

Abbott just completed work on the Riley County Courthouse and is currently working on the Bluemont, Marlatt and Ogden schools.

McCullough Construction Co. has begun construction work on a shopping center in the Candlewood edition located at Seth Childs Road and Kimball Avenue.

Downtown provides nostalgia

Walking tours unfold history of city

By KELLY CARLSON
Staff Writer

Tours of downtown Manhattan were conducted Saturday by members of the Riley County Historical Society as part of the city's June Fun Festival.

One tour covered the general area east of Third Street between Leavenworth and Pierre streets which will occupy the new mall. The other tour traveled west from Third Street to Juliette Avenue.

The tours began with a bit of history of Poyntz Avenue.

Manhattan's main street was named after Col. John Poyntz who helped finance the building of the steamboat Hartford and the trip of the Cincinnati Land Grant Colony to Manhattan. The street is at its location because it separated the Tenny and Dawson Indian Floats — pieces of land given to the Indians by the U.S. Government for their reservations.

The first commercial structures were erected at the east end of Poyntz Avenue when the Blue River still joined the Kaw River and the ferry landed travelers on the bank immediately at the end of the street.

In the 1850s and '60s suppliers for western-bound wagon trains, blacksmiths and livery stables, two hotels and entertainment were to be found in the present 100 and 200 blocks of Poyntz Avenue.

The building on the northeast corner of Third Street and Poyntz Avenue houses the Manhattan Camera Shop and the Art Resources center. This will be the only old building that will remain after the completion of the mall.

This structure was known as the Green and Hessin Building when it was erected in 1884. George Ropes, a Topeka architect who designed the Capitol building, also designed this building.

The First National Bank was located there from the time of its founding in about 1890 until 1912, but was later relocated to the corner of Fourth Street and Poyntz Avenue.

The building which is currently Bailey Moving & Storage Company was formerly the Perry Packing Plant Company, which moved to the site in 1891. This building is one of many that will be destroyed as a result of the new mall.

Bricks from Buffalo, Kan., were used in the 1913 construction of the central part of the building with other sections being added later.

The building was the first in Manhattan to be wired for 440 volts of electricity. Some of the walls are three feet thick and lined with cork as a means to provide insulation for cold storage. In the late 1920's, a third story was added which included a ventilated feeder station for chickens.

Until after World War II, chickens were fattened in the ventilated coop area, then slaughtered, dressed, graded and frozen for shipping to markets on the coasts.

Eggs bought from area farmers were brought to town, graded, packed and shipped out at an average rate of 43 million per year.

Before its final closing in 1962, the Perry Packing Plant was one of the top two industries in Manhattan.

The Huntress Building, on the west side of Third Street and Poyntz Avenue, was recently vacated by the Firestone Tire & Rubber store. It was constructed in about 1880 by Orville Huntress and Ashford Stingley.

Huntress and Stingley had promised to erect "an elegant building on these premises." The firm handled many different items including dry goods, furniture and groceries. Other merchants used rooms in the building for selling their own merchandise.

P.C. Hostrup's barbershop was located in the basement for a time with its own outside entrance, bathrooms and a billiard hall. There was a "notions" store and a fruit and news stand on the premises as well. Pianos were sold from the second-floor furniture store.

The International Order of Odd Fellows used the upper floor meeting hall for many years, and the Manhattan Nationalist newspaper office occupied the building in 1900.

North on Third Street were the City Hall and Fire Station. The early fire department was a volunteer force. Warning of a fire was given by the pounding of a huge metal bell mounted on a tower in front of the building.

The City Hall was torn down in 1957 after the new hall at 11th Street and Poyntz Avenue was established.

Hart gains convention vote from uncommitted delegate

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gary Hart gained a delegate in Kansas Monday, when Ickie Kisner of Stafford, who had been elected in an unpledged status at the 1st District Democratic convention April 14 publicly declared his support for the Colorado senator.

Kisner confirmed to the Associated Press he plans to vote for Hart on the first ballot at the Democratic National Convention after receiving a personal telephone call Monday from Hart.

Hart reached Kisner in Haskell, Texas, where the custom combine crew operator was heading north with the wheat harvest.

"You can pretty well count me for Hart, unless something drastic happens between now and July," Kisner said.

He said Hart asked him to "help woo Mondale delegates in Kansas" over to Hart.

"I told him I'd try out in the 1st District (of western Kansas)," Kisner said. "I think we might get one of them to switch."

Kisner's decision to publicly declare for Hart left Kansas' 44-member delegation to the convention in San Francisco in mid-July with 23 delegates pledged to former Vice President Walter Mondale, 17 pledged to Hart and four still unwilling to make a public declaration.

Of the four who remain unpledged, state Rep. Norman E. Justice of Kansas City, Kan., said he is "leaning toward" the Rev. Jesse Jackson.

Three others, Gov. John Carlin, state Treasurer Joan Finney and state Rep. Ardena Matlack, all remain uncommitted and unwilling to say they are leaning toward any of the three contenders.

Matlack said she leaned toward Mondale earlier, but doesn't want to be listed as supporting any of the three now.

Three other Kansas delegates are party and elected officials who officially are unpledged but have declared their support for Mondale. They are state Chairwoman Pat Lehman, state Vice Chairman Chuck Thompson and U.S. Rep. Dan Glickman.

Mike Swenson, Carlin's press secretary, said both Hart and Mondale have been "working the unpledged delegates very hard" in recent days as the primary and caucus season comes to an end.

Hart is hoping to stave off Mondale's clinching of the nomination before San Francisco, and Mondale is hoping to lock up the nomination before the convention, he noted.

There has been speculation Carlin secretly supports Hart, but Swenson said the governor is dedicated to maintaining his uncommitted status all the way to San Francisco.

Summer theater group to cast 3 plays

By WAYNE PRICE
Arts and Features Editor

The K-State Summer Repertory Theatre will present three plays this summer as the group enters its third season.

Lew Shelton, associate professor of speech and founder of SRT, chose the productions and held auditions during the spring semester.

Shelton will direct "Crimes Of The Heart," which is Beth Henley's Pulitzer Prize-winning play about a "bad day" in the lives of the three Magrath sisters of Mississippi. Babe has shot her V.I.P. husband because she didn't like his looks. Failed singer Meg went insane last Christmas and is still telling lies about her singing career. Lenny is having her 30th birthday, but her sisters didn't remember, and to add to that her horse has died.

The play, which won the Pulitzer before its Broadway debut, deals with the love and caring the sisters provide for each other despite these tragedies.

"True West," which director Doug Hoseney said closed down after one night in New York, is Sam Shepard's play about two rival screenwriting brothers, Lee and Austin, who are constantly at each other throats in an effort to stomp the other one. While the two brothers are opposite enough to be considered non-related, their jealousy and rivalry brings out the violence in each of them.

"It opened in New York and closed right down," Hoseney said. "Some thought it was miscast and Sam Shepard thought it was misdirected. He disowned it (the play) after that. It opened off-Broadway about six months later and it's doing real well."

The play, "The Dining Room," was considered by many critics as one of the 10 best plays of the 1982 season. In a series of short sketches, A. R. Gurney's play comically deals with the decline of a culture and the WASPs of the northeastern United States. Six actors play a variety of characters which calls for them to switch ages from youth to old age. Shelton is directing this play also.

The actors for SRT are Kelli Wondra, junior in theatre, Jackie Keller, sophomore in theatre; Katie Pfister, junior in music; Craig Stout, sophomore in theatre; Barry Pearson, senior in education and speech; and Tom Overmyer, junior in theatre.

As well as directing "True West," Hoseney will also be sound designer for the three plays. In his second season, Jeff Childs, senior in electrical engineering, will be set designer for "True West" and lighting designer for all three productions. Tamara Compton, graduate in speech, is the group's publicist and box office manager. Tammy Holbert, sophomore in speech, is property mistress. Eric Taylor, sophomore in theatre, and David Glenburis, graduate student in theatre are set crew. Jana Evans, senior in theatre, and Cindy Baker, junior in pre-professional secondary education are costume designers. Becky Brizee, senior in theatre, is the stage manager.

Lydia Aseneta, associate professor of speech, is the costume designer and John Uthoff, associate professor of speech, is the technical director and scene designer.

The plays will begin June 26 and run through July 28 in the Purple Masque Theatre located in East Stadium. Tickets for each production will be $4 for the general public and $3 for students and senior citizens.

City band begins season at 8 p.m. in park pavilion

Tonight the Manhattan Municipal Band will open its 64th season with a concert in the City Park Pavilion.

According to Lawrence Norvell, conductor of the band for the last 35 years, the concert will begin at 8 p.m. and last about an hour.

Norvell said one of the soloists will be French horn player Will Robinson, Redbud Estates, who will be performing "If Ever I Would Leave You" from the musical "Camelot." Robinson has a music degree from Fort Hays State University and has done graduate work at the University of New Mexico in Albuquerque.

Charles Moorman, an original member of the Manhattan Municipal Band, from its 1920 opening season, will be performing a xylophone duet with Mary Stamey, Manhattan resident.

The K-State Alumni Band has also established a Charles Moorman Scholarship Fund in his honor. Moorman has been a member of the J.J. Richards Band, the Roy Smith Scottish Highland Band, the Ringling Circus Band, the Sell Flotow Show and the Denver Symphony.

Concertgoers should bring their own chairs.

History

At the northeast corner of Third and Houston streets, is the stone building that, for many years, was known as Peak's Hall.

In the 1870s, one of the town's most active bars was located on the ground floor of the building. A public hall used for theatrical productions and displays, including "Mrs. Jarley's Wax Works," occupied the top floor.

For some, the locations over a saloon made it an unsavory place and there were many calls for a new public hall that would be more suitable for the ladies and children.

During World War I, a soldiers' club room provided recreation for Fort Riley personnel who gathered in town on Saturday afternoons and evenings.

The Community House on the northeast corner of Fourth Street and Poyntz Avenue was built in 1917 as a recreation building for World War I military personnel. The building has remained the focus of community recreation ever since.

Rotary clubs from five states raised contributions to supplement city funds for the building's construction. Since the late 1940s, the building has been the home of the City Recreation Commission.

The northeast corner of Fourth Street and Poyntz Avenue formerly was occupied by the Spot Cash Store. The entire corner now houses the First National Bank and Keller's.

The structure was built by a New York City financier in 1890, and among its first tenants were the YMCA and the Manhattan Academy of Music.

This corner was a popular one for noontime loungers, who, it is said, used to sit on the window sills of the corner section until iron bars — which still remain — were placed on the sills.

The corner building became a bank in 1912 but one can still see the words "Spot Cash" in the tiles to the entrance of Keller's store.

The area west of the Manhattan Motors site and south of the current Sears store occupied a private swimming pool. The year was about 1910 and it was the era when heavy dark woolen swimming suits were worn with stockings and canvas shoes.

The Marshall Theater building, now housing the J.C. Penney store, was built in 1909. The Mercury Industrial Edition of 1913 proclaimed that the theater was one of the few in the state of Kansas affording ample stage room and galleries, and a scenery dome for the use of all scenery usually carried by the larger eastern productions. Modern electrical equipment is used. This permits the use of sunlight, daylight and moonlight effects.

On the corner site of the present Burger King restaurant stood the Purcell Buildings. At one time the Purcell Trading Company claimed to be "Dealers of Everything," merchandising everything from groceries to hardware.

Knostman's Clothing Store was located where J. Riggs West now stands. The original building was constructed in 1890, but a new store built in 1906 was described as "commodious and elegant — beyond all comparison the finest clothing emporium in central Kansas."

The Wareham Complex buildings originated in 1893 when H.P. Wareham bought Moore's Opera House. He continued to produce vaudeville and "opera house" attractions and became the second theater owner in Kansas to show films.

The Federal Building on the corner of Fourth and Houston streets was constructed as a post office between 1907 and 1910 at the cost of $70,000.

The architect, Henry Brinkman, graduated from the Kansas State Agricultural College in 1907. Years later, when the building was to be torn down, local protest prevented such action. Many federal offices have since occupied the building.

French students arrive for summer education

While enrollment was getting under way Monday in the Union, 30 French business students arrived at K-State to participate in the third annual "Summer Study at KSU Program."

The pilot program is being sponsored in cooperation with the International Trade Institute and coordinated through the Division of Continuing Education and K-State.

"The program is designed to give French students a taste of the Midwest," said Conni Herr, conference facilitator. "The purpose is to let them see how we live and what our family lifestyle is like."

The students, who range in age from 18 to 25, will be on campus until July 30, and be enrolled in six credit hours. The students each selected their own classes and will live in Moore Hall with an American student.

Manhattan-area families will play host to the French students and include them in family activities, said Herr. All 30 of the students have a host family.

Marci Lechner, host of French student Frederic Joel Ren, expects the hosting experience to be a successful one.

"It (hosting a French student) will be fun," Lechner said. "Our family is sports-oriented so we're looking for someone interested. (And) there's a lot of historical things around. There's a lot of culture to show them around here."

All of the students speak English with most of them already having taken more than two years of the English language, Herr said.

Eric Pierre, one of the students involved in the program, has taken five years of English, and will be taking marketing, business and grammar classes this summer. Pierre, who attends a private school in the southwest part of France, found adjusting to the difference in France's and the U.S.'s time zones to be a problem.

"When we arrived it was difficult to adapt," Pierre said. "Also, the food here is very different."

Pentagon budget demands better efficiency

The Reagan administration is in the midst of the largest peacetime defense buildup in this nation's history. For the next fiscal year, the House has approved a Pentagon budget of $284 billion. This allocation fits into the Reagan five-year, $1.7 trillion weapon buildup plan.

Clearly, American taxpayers have been hit with a large tab for the price of their security. But the public is not getting what it pays for.

The horror stories of Pentagon spending continue to surface in this election year. The defense department has been caught spending $9,606 for a 12 cent Allen wrench, $37 for a simple screw, $400 for a thumb-sized screw worth pennies and $110 for electronic diodes worth 4 cents. And those are the little mistakes. Due to poor auditing, the Pentagon once overpaid a bill for a helicopter contract by $41 million dollars.

As the defense budget grows, it becomes more unmanageable for the Pentagon. With a budget the size of China's gross national product, mistakes will continue to occur in the present system. Reforms need to be made to enable the Pentagon to handle the taxpayers' money.

Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger claims strides have been made to correct the inefficiency of military spending. At the insistence of Congress, Weinberger has started to implement a plan to increase competition in military contracts, require warranties from military manufacturers, intensify weapons testing and improve auditing, with the goal of cutting Pentagon waste.

Yet the stories of waste and inefficiency continue, despite Weinberger's claims of billions of dollars he has saved. Pentagon mismanagement went on long before the Reagan administration took charge, but with the increase of defense budgets at the expense of social programs, it is time to stop the military's free-spending ways.

The days of the Pentagon writing blank checks to contractors while giving companies no incentive to cut costs must end. A reduction in defense waste would help alleviate the pinch put on the American public and perhaps free up funds for depleted social programs hurt by the current military buildup.

College civil rights policies determine funds

The U.S. Congress has seen many civil rights battles. The most recent is about proposed legislation to require an entire college to conform to civil-rights laws if any of its programs receive federal funds.

The legislation is being considered in response to the Supreme Court's Grove City decision. It ruled that Title IX applied only to individual programs receiving funds. Grove City College in Pennsylvania no longer has to avoid discriminatory practices if its students do not receive federal financial aid.

However, Grove City's president, Charles MacKenzie, fears the legislation being considered will force the school to protect civil rights. He testified before a Senate judiciary committee that "someone, somewhere will attempt to trace a federal dollar to Grove City's treasury." If the attempt is successful, the college must comply with civil-rights laws.

MacKenzie's objections are getting serious consideration in the Congress. Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, has said he may propose an amendment to exempt colleges which receive only student aid.

Such consideration is not deserved. Grove City College students have the right to attend any private institution at their own expense. But no federal money should be given to students attending schools like Grove City College. Discrimination should not be condoned — or federally funded.

Demo race between pragmatist, ombudsman

LOS ANGELES — It was a cool 60 degrees when Gary Hart left New Jersey. It was a brutal 105 when he got to Fresno, Calif., and the temperature hardly mattered at all by the time he ended his day here with a fund-raiser — 17 hours, three time zones and a whole different climate later. The staff said the candidate was tired.

The candidate had spoken on the environment. He had spoken on nuclear non-proliferation, Agent Orange, Indian problems, veterans affairs, education, the MX missile, the B-1 bomber, the Iran-Iraq war and the family farm.

He had been on a boat, a plane, many cars. He had conferred with his staff, given interviews, posed for pictures, reviewed campaign commercials and read snatches of a book on Andrew Jackson.

He had been eloquent. He had been moving. He had been everything a candidate should be, but the question was whether he had been successful.

RICHARD COHEN
Columnist

The immediate answer was no. That's the answer, too, for Walter Mondale who keeps to the same sort of grueling schedule. The two of them, Mondale and Hart, are showing that they have everything it takes to be consummate campaigners — everything, that is, but an audience. Something is wrong with the Great American Political Campaign, at least with the Democratic version of it.

With the exception of Jesse Jackson, it lacks excitement. Some of that has to do with personalities — the drab Mondale, the cool Hart — and some of it with the expectation that no matter who is nominated, Ronald Reagan will win anyway.

But mostly the voters are making the judgment that there is little difference between Hart and Mondale. Stylistically they are different, and there is a difference in age. But they both lack sleep, poetry, a vision of the way things ought to be. What they truly lack is a stark ideology.

That might seem like a strange thing to say, but the fact of the matter is that this race comes down to a contest between an ombudsman and a pragmatist. Mondale is the ombudsman, making sure that each constituency group gets its programs. If it doesn't, it can come and see him — provided, of course, its forms are properly filled out.

As for Hart, his message is not all that much different. His ideology is not to have one. He will take each problem as it comes along. He will examine it, turn it upside down and do things differently. Just don't ask him how.

In a sense these are truly the candidates of the past. Hart stalks the ghosts of the dead Kennedys. He mentions them frequently, imitates them occasionally, even suggests a program that sounds very much like the still-existent Peace Corps. His rallying cry is "pragmatism, pragmatism." It is not a crusader's call to arms.

As for Mondale, he too is evocative of the past — the more recent past: the Hubert Humphrey past, the Lyndon Johnson past, the Jimmy Carter past. If Hart has an edge here, it is that enough time has passed to cast a nostalgic glow over his past. He has the Kennedys; Mondale has to make do with Carter.

It's hard to blame Mondale and Hart for their fix. The plain fact is that the Democratic Party has been ideologically treading water for some time. After Reagan's election, study groups were formed with abandon in the hopes of matching the Republicans idea for idea. It has not been done. Maybe not enough time has passed. Whatever the reason, pragmatism is not a new idea; restoring the Great Society is not one either.

So the campaign limps on. The candidates all but cling to one another like marathon dancers nearing the final hour. They know that most of the audience never showed, but what they can do about it?

Improving English up to foreign instructors

Editor,

This is to respond to the letter of Eric Wilbur (May 3 Collegian) concerning students' difficulties in understanding foreign instructors in classes. I fully sympathize with his problem and urge all instructors, foreign and domestic, to make presentations understandable and interesting to the students. I believe it is the responsibility of the foreign graduate assistants and faculty members to improve their English as much and as rapidly as possible. I have a rule in my research laboratory that between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m., I do not want to hear a foreign language spoken. I hope by doing so our foreign students can learn and use English better and faster.

There are many positive aspects of having foreign faculty and students on campus: scientific expertise, training foreign scholars to improve the problem of world hunger, establishing good international relations, learning something from other cultures, learning a new language properly, etc. If Mr. Wilbur has some time he could help alleviate this problem by being an English conversation volunteer at the international student center to help foreigners to improve English proficiency.

I agree that graduate assistants from foreign countries should be trained and screened first before being asked to teach classes. As for screening teachers before hiring, I can assure you that K-State always screens applicants, domestic and foreign alike, very carefully before hiring.

I hope American students and faculty can work together with the foreign students and faculty to alleviate this problem. After all, besides the native American Indians, we are all foreigners, some more recent, others remote.

Kennedy, friend show 'abilities'

BOSTON — Ted Kennedy Jr., son of the U.S. senator, accompanied a friend and fellow amputee Monday on the first mile of a cross-country run to show the abilities of the disabled.

Jeff Keith, 21, of Fairfield, Conn., who lost a leg to cancer nine years ago, began the six-month fund-raising run to Los Angeles from historic Faneuil Hall amid a host of well-wishers, friends, state officials and representatives of the American Cancer Society.

Kennedy, who lost a leg to cancer 10 years ago, told a breakfast gathering that his family made him believe that "nothing could stand in my way and the only obstacles are the ones we create ourselves."

In 1980, Canadian Terry Fox ran across part of Canada to raise money for cancer research. Fox died in 1981 at age 22.

Princess to visit North Carolina

RALEIGH, N.C. — Princess Anne of England will visit North Carolina July 12-13 to help the state celebrate her country's first try at settling the New World, organizers say.

Invited by America's 400th Anniversary Committee, she is expected to attend a dinner party given by Gov. Jim Hunt and visit Manteo, the coastal town where the British landed 400 years ago.

Father's portrait moves first lady

DUBLIN, Ireland — First lady Nancy Reagan broke into tears Monday as she unveiled a portrait of her father, the late Dr. Loyal Davis, at Dublin's Royal College of Surgeons.

"I'm sorry, I'm having trouble with this," she said, choking back sobs. She stood for a few moments, weeping in silence.

Davis, a neurosurgeon, was a professor emeritus at Northwestern University when he died in August 1982. He had been named an honorary fellow at Dublin's Royal College, the school's highest honor, in 1981. Davis was Reagan's stepfather until he legally adopted her when she was 14.

McEnroe strikes compromise

PARIS — Tennis star John McEnroe, known for temperamental tantrums on the court, reached a compromise Monday with photographers whom he was trying to restrict at the French Open tennis tournament.

The compromise, which averted a threatened boycott by angry professional photographers, allows them to shoot pictures from areas behind players at Center Court except during serves.

During his fourth-round match on Sunday, McEnroe got into several arguments with photographers after complaining the whirring noise from their motor-driven cameras was bothering him during his serve.

At last year's French Open, McEnroe was fined after slapping one photographer's telephoto lens with his racket.

Rec Services keeps students active

By STEVE ONKEN
Collegian Reporter

With the arrival of summer comes the aim toward fitness, the need for recreation and the chance to become better acquainted with the great outdoors. The K-State Recreational Services has just the answer to quench that thirst for summertime activities offering numerous programs to students and faculty.

According to Steve Martini, assistant intramural director, student intramurals will begin June 12 with a sign-up deadline of Friday for all activities. Sign-ups will be taken in the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area main office Monday through Friday 8 a.m.-5 p.m.

The varied intramural activities include softball, handball, racquetball, tennis, badminton, horseshoes, 2-on-2 volleyball, 3-on-3 basketball and a basketball tournament. Faculty/staff golf will be offered beginning June 15 with a sign-up deadline of June 14.

Martini said that people who were students in the fall and spring often sign up for the summer programs. But Martini stressed that these individuals cannot participate in summer intramurals unless they are currently enrolled.

"The only people who can sign up for these intramural activities are people who are enrolled this summer and who are summer school students," Martini said.

In addition to the competitive intramurals, an exercise program begins today and will run Monday, Tuesday and Thursday from 5:30-6:30 p.m. through July 27.

The Rec Complex has 16 handball/racquetball courts; basketball, tennis, volleyball, badminton, weight and exercise training rooms; multi-purpose dance/combatives area; and an elevated running track.

Summer hours for the Rec Complex are Monday, Wednesday and Friday 6 a.m.-10 p.m.; Tuesday and Thursday 8 a.m.-10 p.m.; Saturday, 11 a.m.-6 p.m.; and Sunday, 2-10 p.m.

"As far as intramurals goes in the summer, the attendance is not as high, but is indicative of the lower number of students in the summer months. There is just a lot more things to do in the summer months," Martini said.

The Natatorium offers swimming, diving and sunning at various times throughout the day. The schedule runs Monday through Friday 6:30-7:30 a.m.; 11:30 a.m.-3 p.m. and 7-9 p.m. Sunday hours are 1-4 p.m. and 7-9 p.m. The Natatorium is closed on Saturdays.

Another program available is equipment check-out, offered on a daily and an overnight basis with a three-day limit. Equipment available includes archery equipment, badminton sets, volleyball sets and horseshoes. Outdoor equipment rental is also available including canoes, general camping equipment such as tents, sleeping bags, coolers and bicycle touring equipment.

When play was finally abandoned for the day, defending champion Yannick Noah of France was involved in a struggle on Center Court against Hungary's Balazs Taroczy.

The Hungarian took the first set 6-3 and Noah the second 6-2. Only one game of the third set was possible, and Taroczy held his own service.

Hana Mandlikova, the No. 3 seed in the women's singles, raced through the opening set against 16-year-old qualifier Melissa Brown of Scarsdale, N.Y.

But the teen-ager, who upset No. 6 seed Zina Garrison on Sunday, overcame her early nerves and took a 3-2 in the second set lead when the match was halted by the weather.

Langston stops Royals

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY — Rookie Mark Langston pitched a five-hitter and the Seattle Mariners took advantage of a shoddy Kansas City defense to whip the Royals 7-1 Monday night.

Langston, 3-4, gave up a home run in the first to George Brett but checked the Royals the rest of the way, striking out six and walking three. Rookie Brett Saberhagen, 2-5, took the loss.

The Mariners went ahead with sacrifice flies in the fourth by Alvin Davis and Ken Phelps. A double by Steve Henderson and a triple by Spike Owen made it 3-1 in the fifth, then the Royals gave Seattle three unearned runs in the sixth.

With one out, Saberhagen hit Davis with a pitch and walked Phelps. Al Cowens bounced an apparent double-play grounder to shortstop Onix Concepcion. But the shortstop booted the ball as Davis scored, Phelps went to third and Cowens took second.

Second baseman Frank White then fielded Henderson's sharp grounder and threw to catcher Don Slaught, who dropped the ball for an error as Phelps crashed into him and scored. Cowens went to third on the play and made it 6-1 on Larry Milbourne's fielder's choice.

Jack Perconte's double in the ninth delivered the last Seattle run.

Rain shortens day at French Open

By The Associated Press

PARIS — Rain washed out all but a few hours' play at the French Open tennis championships Monday, but not before Ivan Lendl, Jimmy Connors and Andres Gomez had booked their places in the quarterfinals of the men's singles.

Lendl, the No. 2 seed, demolished 11th-seeded Anders Jarryd of Sweden 6-4, 6-0, 6-4. The right-hander, still seeking his first Grand Slam title after reaching four finals, has not lost a set in four rounds of the competition.

In the quarterfinals, Lendl will meet Andres Gomez of Ecuador, who on Monday ousted another Swede, Jan Gunnarsson, 6-3, 6-1, 6-3. As he did on Sunday, Connors had first-set jitters. His opponent, unseeded Emilio Sanchez of Spain, who is ranked 87th in the world on the Atari-ATP computer, had three break points to take a 4-0 lead in the opening set, but missed his chance.

Connors responded by taking 10 games in a row and then went on to play "as good as I have ever done on clay."

The third-seeded American won 6-4, 6-1, 6-1.

Mats Wilander's fourth-round match against No. 13 Juan Aguilera of Spain was one of several washed out by the rain, which caused a three-hour, 15-minute delay at midday. The rain returned later, accompanied by thunder and lightning, and only about three hours' play was possible.

When play was finally abandoned for the day, defending champion Yannick Noah of France was involved in a struggle on Center Court against Hungary's Balazs Taroczy.

The Hungarian took the first set 6-3 and Noah the second 6-2. Only one game of the third set was possible, and Taroczy held his own service.

Hana Mandlikova, the No. 3 seed in the women's singles, raced through the opening set against 16-year-old qualifier Melissa Brown of Scarsdale, N.Y.

But the teen-ager, who upset No. 6 seed Zina Garrison on Sunday, overcame her early nerves and took a 3-2 in the second set lead when the match was halted by the weather.

K-State police strive to better relations

By ROB FENSKE
Contributing Writer

Although the K-State Police Department provides many vital services, ticket writing is one of its most visible functions and it is one that often sours student attitudes.

Campus police have organized and are in the process of developing a student participation program to show students a brighter side of police work. The name of the program is Students Concerned Assisting Law Enforcement (SCALE).

SCALE's primary purpose will be to provide escorts upon request for people walking on campus after dark. Secondary duties include crowd assistance at campus activities and giving information and directions.

SCALE will eventually be set up so student volunteers will be on call several nights a week from 7 to 11 p.m.

During this on-call period, the police dispatcher will radio the student patroller when an escort is requested. The student volunteer will then travel by bicycle or ride in a patrol car to meet the person.

There are several reasons for using students instead of patrol officers, said Art Stone, chief of the K-State Police. In addition to time restrictions, it is against the department's policy to use patrol cars as a "taxi service," he said.

Stone said uniforms will be issued to SCALE members and training in general campus knowledge, public relations and communications will be stressed. In addition to training, a background investigation of each applicant will be required.

"The problem with a program like this is that there are a few unstable individuals who would use it to their own advantage. We just can't have people escorting who we're not sure about," Stone said.

Although SCALE has been discussed by the campus police for several years, it wasn't given serious consideration for actual organization and development until Steve Hall, assistant registrar, agreed to sponsor the program last summer. Hall had just arrived from Northwest Missouri State University on Aug. 1, 1983, when he was approached with the idea. His sponsorship of several fraternities and student ambassadorships at NWMS made Hall a prime candidate for leading SCALE.

"SCALE would give students a chance to participate; it would let them experience what police go through. My philosophy is that students make the University — without their support, you're in a lot of trouble," Hall said.

Lt. James Tubach, K-State police officer and one of SCALE's organizers, said student involvement is a good public relations device.

"Student-to-student contact is much more effective than officer-to-student contact. Peer pressure may be a problem at first. But as more students become involved over time, the program should become more visible and gain acceptance," he said.

More than public relations, Tubach stressed the practical need for a well-organized escort service.

"If someone called us wanting to know about available escort services, I wouldn't know what to tell them. The dorms and fraternities have poor organization and listing of their services," Tubach said.

Tubach isn't sure about the public demand for an escort service. He sees students as unpredictable from year to year, making it difficult to know whether they want an escort service or if they just want more patrols in the area.

However, K-State students do seem supportive of SCALE's basic idea.

"I'd never heard of SCALE, but I think it's a pretty good idea. We need something like that. I know some girls who are reluctant to walk to my apartment alone after dark," said Chad Messenger, senior in finance.

Sheree Eisenbraun, senior in business management, also said the service is needed.

"I'm afraid to cross campus at night and don't do it very often. I even carry a mace can," she said.

Even though SCALE has a sponsor and some public support, a shortage of student volunteers to sign up for the program has caused delay. So far, only five students have signed up as volunteers, and Tubach said he wants at least 10.

No promotional or advertising budget has been allocated to the program. Aside from one Collegian article printed last fall, the only way of informing students about SCALE is word-of-mouth.

However, the recruiting problem isn't strictly due to weak program exposure. Some students just don't have the time to spare. Student taboo concerning "joining the cops" keeps other people away.

"People are really negative when it comes to helping out," said Tim Trail, freshman in electrical engineering, who is a SCALE volunteer and student employee of the campus police. "It's probably due to all the tickets we write. I know my attitude has changed a lot since I started working here last year."

Officer Richard Herrman said he has found few problems involving student attitudes toward the program. When asked about the relationship between students and the campus police, Herrman said that things have definitely improved since his first year in 1974. He said most earlier troubles were a "lapover from the '60s and the Vietnam era" when students generally opposed any type of authority.

"Back then, it was almost disappointing if you didn't have any high-speed chase at least twice a week. People just wouldn't stop for lights and sirens," he said.

Herrman said he thinks that the campus police have a better chance of getting close to the public than most city police departments.

"On a campus, you're dealing with people in a small, confined area. This increases the ability to deal with them on a one-to-one basis...there's more repeated dealing with the same individuals. The majority of associations I've had on this campus have been very good," he said.

Mondale victorious in last leg of 'marathon'

By The Associated Press

Walter F. Mondale swept to resounding victories Tuesday in New Jersey and West Virginia and pronounced himself the winner of his grueling Democratic presidential marathon with Gary Hart. Hart led in California, claimed victory there, and said he was in the race "to San Francisco."

Hart won in South Dakota and New Mexico in the five-state primary finale.

The last and biggest prize, California, was close in early returns. Despite Hart's prediction of victory in the state, Mondale led for more than enough delegates to validate his claim of a nominating majority.

Hart said "of course" he would maintain his candidacy, but the small state triumphs were little consolation for the twin victories he hoped for in New Jersey and California to give momentum and credibility to his cause.

Mondale — expected to breeze to the nomination in the pre-primary handicapping — said he thought the race was finally over, the persistent Hart finally vanquished.

"Marathons are long and hard, but every one of them has a finish line and a winner. Well this is it and here I am," Mondale told supporters in St. Paul, Minn. "We have carried New Jersey and West Virginia overwhelmingly."

In all, 486 convention delegates were at stake on the final day of a long primary season that began in a New Hampshire snowstorm. Even before the polls closed, Mondale picked up a dozen additional delegates from among previously uncommitted in other states.

That put him about 220 short of the 1,967 delegates he needs to claim a majority for nomination and meant he needed to win 45 percent of Tuesday's total to reach his goal.

Mondale said he would make an important announcement "about who won" the nomination at 11:59 a.m. today — the moment he had predicted he would have the delegate majority needed to claim the prize.

Mondale said, "Let's see what develops after two good nights' sleep. None of us have had that for a long time."

He declared his concern was for party unity, and said, "I'm not going to give advice to the other candidates at this time."

The television networks, reporting based on polling place interviews with voters, said California would be close. The Rev. Jesse Jackson was expected to trail far behind in all the elections.

NBC said Mondale would add West Virginia to his New Jersey victory, pulling more than half the vote for the first time this year.

As the polls closed, the Associated Press survey of delegates showed Mondale with 1,748, Hart with 983 and Jackson with 335.

With 58 percent of the precincts counted in New Jersey, Mondale had 46 percent of the vote, to 31 percent for Hart and 21 percent for Jackson. Lyndon LaRouche had 2 percent.

In West Virginia, with 17 percent of the precincts counted, Mondale had 53 percent of the vote to 37 percent for Hart and 7 percent for Jackson. LaRouche had 2 percent.

In South Dakota, 77 percent of the precincts gave Hart 50 percent of the vote to 40 percent for Mondale and 5 percent for Jackson, 3 percent for LaRouche and 2 percent uncommitted.

In New Mexico, with 57 percent of the vote counted, Hart with 47 percent, Mondale with 35 percent and Jackson 12 percent. One percent was uncommitted, three percent voted for dropout George McGovern and two percent for LaRouche.

Jackson, looked to increase his delegate strength at the Democratic National Convention in July and maintain his eligibility for federal campaign funds. He needed at least 20 percent of the vote in at least one state to maintain his eligibility.

Although there were five presidential primaries Tuesday, New Jersey, with 107 delegates, and California, with 306, drew most of the candidates' time and dwindling resources.

Public and private surveys showed Mondale leading in both states as he bid for a majority of nominating delegates. He and Hart predicted victory in both New Jersey and California, and Hart's aides said he needed to capture both states to keep alive his nominating challenge all the way to the convention.

Hart, himself, said he was in the race to stay, no matter what.

Mondale, who began the day with commitments from more than 1,730 delegates, has been methodically approaching the 1,967 needed for a majority. If he can reach and hold that majority, they will vote him the nomination. He has predicted he would top the majority level by noon, today, as California returns are still being tabulated.

But under Democratic party rules, delegates are not bound — even those elected in a candidate's name.

So even if Mondale reaches the majority mark, he can't clinch the nomination until the roll call. If he loses either New Jersey or California, he may be forced to spend his time between now and then defending his delegates against raids by Hart, Jackson or supporters of a fourth contender who has not yet emerged.

President Reagan was on the GOP ballot in all five states. Practically unopposed, he long ago amassed the delegates for renomination.

There were congressional and gubernatorial primaries in nine states, although none of the six senators or three governors on the ballot faced a serious threat to renomination. Democratic Gov. Jay Rockefeller in West Virginia and former Gov. William Winter in Mississippi were favored to win nominations for Senate races in November.

Steve Traylor, member of the Manhattan Municipal Band, plays his tuba during the band's first concert of the season at the City Park Pavilion Tuesday night.

Municipal band starts 64th year in park concert

The chairs were dusty, there were periodic gusts of wind which blew down a trumpet player's music and there was a foul odor coming from several full trash cans, but that didn't hinder almost 250 people from attending the Manhattan Municipal Band's 64th opening concert in the City Park Pavilion.

The band, under the direction of Lawrence Norvell, opened with the "Star Spangled Banner" and played a variety of melodies including "American Folk Rhapsody," "His Honor, March" and "Bill Bailey."

One of the highlights of the concert came when Charles Moorman, a member of the Manhattan Municipal Band since its 1920 opening season, performed a xylophone duet with Mary Stamey, playing "Two Imps." Moorman, who is in his 80s, has had a scholarship fund established in his name by the K-State Alumni Band.

Another feature of the concert was a solo performance by Will Robinson who sang, "If Ever I Should Leave You," from the musical "Camelot."

Robinson said he sang the same song at last year's opening, but this time he wished to dedicate the song to his fiancée telling the audience, "Once again, with a lot more feeling than last year."

Robinson has a music degree from Fort Hays State University and done graduate work at the University of New Mexico in Albuquerque.

Robinson also congratulated Norvell on being nominated for the "Outstanding Teacher Award" for the Manhattan school district.

Mike Coss, nationally known as an expert musician and for singing humorous folk music will be performing Friday.

The Manhattan Band plays again Tuesday, and will feature a solo from J.V. Hefel who will sing "Old Man River" from Jerome Kern's popular musical "Showboat."

The concerts are part of the Arts in the Park series sponsored by the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department. All concerts begin at 8 p.m. in the City Park Pavilion.

Funds for field fall short

City pays higher lighting bill

By MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

Manhattan's share of the funds to buy lights for K-State's Frank Meyer Baseball Complex will be higher than originally planned.

Last year, the city and the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics agreed to split the cost of a lighting system for the baseball complex. When the department was unable to raise its share of the funds, it asked the Manhattan City Commission to increase the city's share.

Tuesday night, the commissioners voted to provide $22,500 in addition to the original $50,000.

Mayor Dave Fiser said he supported the increasing the city's support because there is not now a competitive baseball field with lights in the Manhattan city. He also said he considers the lighting issue to be a priority item for adults, children and those who will use the complex in the future.

"We have a lot of (community) projects. Only a very few of our citizens have benefited directly (from the community projects), perhaps, on a daily basis, but they have increased the quality of life in our community."

"We have managed to look at those projects individually, and determine whether or not they should be done in our community. I think this is one that should be done," Fiser said.

Commissioners Wanda Fateley and Suzanne Lindamood supported the funding, but urged the commission to look to other revenue sources for future projects. Fateley said there are other sources of funds not being utilized for community projects.

The commission also approved submission of an application for a Small Cities Community Block Grant for public facilities.

In its authorization of the submission of the grant, members of the commission expressed doubt that the funds would be granted. Fateley said she believed the grant would not be considered a priority.

The grant would fund public improvements in south Manhattan. These would include allocations for renovation of the Douglass Center Pool and Bathhouse and the South Manhattan Neighborhood Park.

Pool renovation would consist of changing the pool from a full pool area with a diving well to a training-type pool for recreational use without a diving well. Members of the South Manhattan Neighborhood Association oppose this change. An association spokeswoman said the south Manhattan community needs a full-service pool.

Commission members voted to submit the grant application, 3-1.

"I'm going to support this because I think it's a start," Commissioner Rick Mann said.

Fateley said she did not support the submission because she knew there was "no chance" of it being funded.

In other business, the commission received a report from the Parks and Recreation Advisory Board regarding the acquisition of Hunter's Island property in northeast Manhattan for a recreation/sports complex. The commission decided to hold discussion of the issue until all reports of feasible sites for the complex were completed.

KC justice sentences extortionist

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Convicted Tylenol extortionist James W. Lewis Tuesday was sentenced to two five-year terms for deliberately filing false information with the Internal Revenue Service in 1981.

In addition, Lewis is scheduled to be sentenced next week in Chicago on a charge of attempting to extort $1 million from Johnson and Johnson during a nation-wide panic sparked by the deaths of seven people from cyanide-tainted Tylenol capsules.

Lewis' sentencing Tuesday was in connection with a 1981 tax fraud scheme in which he took a $2,500 check one of his tax service clients paid to the IRS and directed the tax agency to apply it toward a phony business he established. Lewis then filed a return seeking $2,243.

Improved radar plane arrives in Saudi Arabia

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — An improved U.S. radar plane capable of observing precisely air attacks on shipping in the Persian Gulf has arrived in Saudi Arabia, the Pentagon said Tuesday.

The advanced AWACS (Airborne Warning and Control System) aircraft replaces an earlier version of the U.S.-manned surveillance radar plane which was able only to detect and track movements of airplanes but was not sophisticated enough to "see" ships actually under attack from the air.

Eventually, Pentagon spokesman Michael Burch said, all four U.S.-manned AWACS planes stationed in Saudi Arabia will be replaced by the newer "maritime" version.

He stressed that the new AWACS — which arrived in Saudi Arabia on Monday night — will operate in the same air space that the older planes have patrolled over Saudi Arabia for the last four years. Those U.S. planes have generally stayed about 50 miles inside the Saudi borders from which their long-range radar can extend into the Persian Gulf to watch for possible Iranian air attacks.

Burch said the crews of the new AWACS would be able to contact U.S. warships cruising in the Persian Gulf in case of a threatened attack on American shipping.

He noted that the four U.S. frigates and destroyers which normally operate in the southern half of the Persian Gulf monitor the movements of U.S. Navy tankers which pick up fuel at Bahrain and then sail back out of the gulf to supply American warships in the Arabian Sea and the Philippines.

Meanwhile, a congressional study said that the Stinger air defense missiles that the Reagan administration has sent to Saudi Arabia might be ineffective in protecting shipping in the Persian Gulf.

The study by the Congressional Research Service said aircraft with infra-red countermeasures equipment might prevent the heat-seeking Army missiles from hitting their targets.

Field day presents changes in farming

By GARY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

Farmers from across the state came to K-State Tuesday to learn new techniques that may improve the efficiency of production in the nation's breadbasket.

The 473 participants saw exhibits and demonstrations on new ways being tested to produce more, better quality wheat with easier management as part of the Wheat Field Day sponsored by the agronomy department at K-State's Agronomy Research Farm.

Clarence Swallow, associate professor of agronomy and superintendent of the agronomy farm, said the theme of the field day is different every year. This year's theme centered on wheat and other grains. "Usually the field day is held here in Manhattan," he said, "but it has been held in other parts of the state, such as Topeka and Hutchinson."

Many exhibits and prototypes were set up around the research farm, including research plots of ground where both new types and older, improved types of grain were planted. Machinery shown included improved combines and planters. The Dyna-Cart, a dynamometer for evaluating tractor performance, was also demonstrated at the field day.

David Pacey, assistant professor of extension agriculture engineering, said the Dyna-Cart simulates loads of several different sizes and types of implements with unusual consistency.

Engineers demonstrated three advantages of the Dyna-Cart: it can gear up and throttle down for fuel saving with light loads, it can shift on the go and it has mechanical front-wheel drive.

Also featured at the field day was Newton, a hybrid wheat. This particular hybrid — which is growing in popularity with Kansas farmers — was developed at the agronomy farm.

A browsing tent was available so visitors could meet with specialists and scientists to discuss agriculture-related topics.

Swallow said the agronomy farm also plays the part of helping farmers with specific problems. If a farmer's county extension agent cannot solve a specific problem, the agent will call the agronomy farm for help in answering questions.

In certain cases when the problems cannot be solved at the agronomy farm, research plots may be set up on the farmer's land, then carefully studied by K-State agronomists.

The agronomy farm is a home station with eight experimental fields located in different areas of the state. There are five other experimental stations in the state that handle other agricultural needs.

Board appoints administrator

By STEVE ONKEN
Collegian Reporter

Later this summer, there will be a new man at the helm for Unified School District 383.

Harold G. "Hal" Rowe, 48, has been appointed the new superintendent of schools for the Manhattan-Ogden school district. He will replace retiring superintendent James Benjamin, who led the school district for the previous eight years.

"My general observations of Manhattan are that there is a very high and positive feeling on the part of Manhattan's school district and business community. My expectations are high. People are proud of what's there, and I have seen that confirmed," Rowe said.

Don Hill, school board vice-president, said the local Board of Education conducted interviews with candidates, before unanimously voting to appoint Rowe to the position.

"We narrowed the candidates to five, but he was the one that we (the board) felt more comfortable with and that we felt was the best," he said. "He has an excellent track record in the past and everyone is looking forward to working with him."

Hill said Rowe has the unique characteristic of "bringing out the good qualities in the people" and is also "very goal oriented," which, he said, will provide firm leadership for the coming years.

In turn, Rowe praised school board members, saying they are always looking for ways to improve, which will be a "unique challenge for a superintendent."

Rowe said the school district has been highly effective in the past, but added that "improvement is essential even for a quality base."

"We have an excellent school system and he just wants to build on that excellence," Hill said.

Rowe said he was attracted to the job at Manhattan because he was interested in locating in a university community that also has an excellent secondary school system.

"The impact of a university in a community is great as it is loaded with many advantages. People with different cultural interests is an advantage in the community; and this usually cannot occur without the existence of the university," Rowe said.

Nothing new is on the agenda for Rowe. He said he has no plans for altering his position responsibilities.

"I am really coming to Manhattan with no preconceived plans. I am just going to pick up and build on what's there."

Rowe has 15 years of experience as a superintendent at schools in Nebraska and Ohio. He was offered a three-year contract with the local school district, although some details of the contract have not been completed.

Rowe's salary will begin at $60,000 plus fringe benefits. He is to arrive in Manhattan July 6 from Bowling Green (Ohio) University, where he has been an associate professor of educational administration since 1981.

A native of Lincoln, Neb., Rowe did his college work in Lincoln earning his bachelor's degree in social studies and physical education from Nebraska Wesleyan and his master's and doctorate degrees from the University of Nebraska-Lincoln.

Law changes titling methods

By MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

Recent state legislation has changed the process of getting a title and license for a used car which has been bought on an out-of-state title.

Effective May 24, purchasers of these used cars must report to a Kansas Highway Patrol station for a vehicle identification number verification.

The Highway Patrol will check vehicles for identification numbers and give buyers a completed form which must be presented at the county treasurer's office along with the other papers necessary to purchase a Kansas title and registration for a vehicle.

The law also affects people who move to Kansas and have an out-of-state title to a car they already own.

Owners of vehicles titled on non-highway (inoperable) Kansas titles must first report to the county treasurer's office for a one-day permit. This will allow them to transport the vehicle to the patrol station for the procedure when they want to return a vehicle to regular highway status.

The law was passed to help deal with the problem of bringing stolen vehicles into the state. Officers at the patrol stations check mileage and actual title numbers, and screen for stolen vehicles through verification of the identification numbers, said Mary Lowman, Riley County treasurer.

The cost for the identification number verification is $10 and must be paid in cash or money order only. Lowman said the effect of this law has definitely been felt in Riley County, as there are a number of students and military personnel who need to title cars in Kansas from out-of-state titles.

A permanent inspection station has not yet been set up in Riley County. Lowman said the Highway Patrol is currently inspecting vehicles from 9-10 a.m. on Monday and 1-2 p.m. Wednesday at the Riley County Courthouse. She said there may be revisions in this schedule.

When the law went into effect there were no locations available in Riley County for the procedure.

"Our problem was the confusion as to where the inspection was to take place. We really didn't anticipate the restrictions on the inspection times. It kind of caught us all off guard," Lowman said.

The treasurer's office is working with the Highway Patrol in this area to establish exactly how much demand there will be for the identification inspections. Lowman said when they are certain of the exact need for the inspections, there may be changes made in the time schedule of the officers performing the inspections.

Some people have been turned away at the treasurer's office because their vehicle lacked the inspection, but the problem should be resolved once the public becomes aware of the new law, Lowman said.

Cards baffle Carlin's staff

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin baffled members of his statehouse staff during his recent 16-day trip to Europe with mysterious post cards he sent each of his employees.

The puzzling post cards were handwritten by the Democratic governor and each contained one or two sentences and usually parts of another. Each was signed "John."

What confused the staff was that each post card, individually, did not make sense.

"I came up with the idea on my own that instead of finding 28 ways to say 'hi, I miss you, see you soon,' I'd write one letter," Carlin explained upon returning last week.

"It was my idea, something I thought of before we left. I was kidding with somebody that I hoped the staff didn't expect me to bring each of them something. And he said I could at least send everyone a card. But with 25 or 30 people on my staff — that's a lot of cards."

So Carlin had labels typed before he left with the names and addresses of each of his workers and, during a break in his travels to Great Britain, West Germany and Scotland, he sat down and wrote the staff a letter... one long chain letter, running like jigsaw puzzle on each of the nearly 30 cards.

"Some of my staff was quite concerned," Carlin laughed. "They thought the governor was (going crazy.) They still haven't pulled it all together yet."

Democrats consider woman as choice in '84

To everything there is a season, and this fall may be the season for a woman as the running mate for the Democratic nominee.

The idea has finally been given serious thought by the candidates, as well as many influential politicians across the nation. The time is right for a woman to take a major role in politics.

The Democrats have already compiled a list of female vice presidential hopefuls. New York Congresswoman Geraldine Ferraro and San Francisco Mayor Dianne Feinstein are head the list. Other possibilities include Louisiana Congresswoman Corinne C. Boggs and Colorado Congresswoman Patricia Schroeder.

Women have been involved in politics on a local scale for several years, yet few women hold major political offices. This would change if a woman is on the Democratic ticket.

In November, women will make up 54 percent of the electorate. This is a substantial number of votes with which Democrats need to contend. Both parties need to be aware of the impact of the women's vote in the '80s, and choosing a woman as the vice presidential candidate is definitely a step in the right direction.

A woman on the ticket would not guarantee the Democrats votes. Women are included in a number of interest groups and are concerned with issues directly affecting them, including abortion and the Equal Rights Amendment. But women are also interested in other issues.

A woman on the ticket would constitute what could be called a new thread in the fabric of politics. Women are occupying more influential roles every day, and politics is just one area where women can compete with men on equal ground.

Although some groups, such as the Moral Majority and certain labor organizations, oppose the thought of a woman as vice president, the idea will surely become a political reality soon. The time has come for voters and politicians alike to take a serious look at the changing roles of women, and men, in the world.

Melissa Brune, for the Editorial Board

Despite past history, Nixon mystique remains

During the early '50s Richard Nixon was fairly new at the game of politics. But he showed excellent verbal poise and side stepping, when, after being accused of accepting gifts as a congressman, he delicately changed the argument as to appear that someone was threatening to take away his daughter's dog, Checkers.

While Nixon indeed was showing endearing compassion for man's best friend he somewhat lacked showing much regard for the citizens of this country. And while I doubt Checkers could ever bring himself to make the same speech for his master, a considerable mass of Americans refused to heed the foreshadowing and handed him one of the most important positions in the world.

Even after his little fiasco with the Committee to Re-elect the President and the Watergate cover-up, a large number of those same "Yankee-Doodle-Andy" intellectuals still look past those deceptions and loyally say, "Nixon was one of the best presidents we've had." "He got us out of the Vietnam War" and the classic, "He didn't do anything any other president hasn't done."

To clear up any false notions about Nixon getting the United States out of Vietnam, there is incredible evidence suggesting that Nixon's efforts to end U.S. involvement in Vietnam was far more for political reasons than some great act of humanity. Documented evidence said that while the Nixon-Kissinger team opened up peace negotiations in Paris with the North Vietnamese, it was secretly planning to use the "November Option."

This was Kissinger's plan calling for the mining of the harbor at Haiphong and the bombing of North Vietnam on a massive scale. Nixon, however, was still worried about the anti-war movement that ravaged President Johnson's term, and implemented the plan much later as peace talks were "moving forward." I guess mines and bombs were Nixon's idea of being therapeutic and the logical way to achieve peace.

As far as being "the best president we've had," that's even more debatable. His price freeze was called successful; it was successful, mostly, in getting prices raised and then having producers keep those prices high for fear of another such freeze. He attempted to use the Internal Revenue Service to harass demonstrators against his reelection campaign. Having voters give him a landslide victory, despite that, is like smiling and telling the mugger, "Thanks for stealing my wallet."

The final argument that Nixon was "just the next person in a long line of traditional corruption" — well, that may or may not be true, but does past corruption call for redemption? I don't think so. If it does, where is the line drawn? If the majority of citizens had been accused of just one of those charges, we'd, more than likely, say "guilty" and convict them. Is there some level of government or power where such acts become legal?

A majority of people fail to realize that Nixon was not just accused of the cover-up and withholding evidence. According to Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein in "The Final Days," there was a roster of allegations against the president: "that International Telephone & Telegraph had virtually bribed him with a donation to his 1972 reelection campaign; that he had cheated on his income taxes; that he had used government funds to vastly improve his estates in Key Biscayne and San Clemente, Calif.; that he had backdated the deed to his vice-presidential papers in order to claim a $500,000 tax deduction."

He was also accused of raising the price of milk supports in exchange for campaign contributions from the dairy industry, and having two important campaign officials look into the possibility of illegally influencing the Securities and Exchange Commission for a $200,000 contribution from an international swindler named Robert Vesco.

When confronting Nixon supporters with the argument that he shouldn't have been pardoned, but put in prison with his cohorts, the reply is, "They already took the presidency away from him, so there's no need to punish him further." Well, maybe it was taken away from him, but it was also given to him, along with a certain degree of trust. And after that, if people still compare him to St. Francis of Assisi, all one can do is bite his nails and think those people deserve what they get.

Lawyers gain equality

It is perhaps ironic that the law profession, a field dedicated to the preservation of justice and equality, should itself be challenged to reassess its sex discrimination policies.

In a celebrated law case, the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously decided anti-discrimination laws apply to partnerships in law firms, even when those firms are choosing new members of the firm.

What this means is that women in the law profession have a chance to legally challenge employers who pass them over for promotion or advancement in law firms. Although the number of women in the law profession has doubled in 10 years, the average amount of women partners in the leading law firms is only about 4 percent.

The Supreme Court decision last week concerned the case of Elizabeth Hishon, a lawyer for the law firm of King & Spalding. Hishon worked seven years in the firm's real-estate department before she was passed over for a partnership in 1979. Hishon left the firm, but filed suit against King & Spalding for sex discrimination.

The firm argued that the anti-discrimination laws provided under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 did not apply to partnership decisions and claimed that the law profession merited special constitutional protection for their "distinctive contribution" to society.

This attitude on the part of the King & Spalding firm reflects general attitudes of the law profession and, in turn, of the professional and academic worlds.

To many, anti-discrimination and affirmative action policies are a nuisance, rather than a protective measure as they were intended.

Many firms believe they are above the law and do not conform to the regulations. Those in the justice system should remember the laws they help make and enforce apply to them as well.

Many do not realize the frustration of being passed over for job promotions or other advancements in employment.

Many do not empathize with minority workers who are patronized and who know by experience that discrimination is alive and well in the job market.

Last week the Supreme Court overturned two earlier decisions by lower courts and decided anti-discrimination laws do indeed apply to partnerships. This decision not only applies to law firms, but could affect accounting firms, architecture firms and other partnerships with 15 or more employees. This and other recent court decisions have brought the topic of discrimination to the forefront of the public conscience.

Perhaps, with the recent attention paid to this topic by the press, the public will be more aware of the discrimination still afflicting our society. We should remember the strides we have made in the 20 years since the Civil Rights era. However, we must also look at the present and the future to assure that the strides our justice system is taking are forward and not in reverse.

Communication takes effort

Editor,

On the last day of spring semester classes you published a letter of continuing importance ("Foreign instructors difficult to understand," May 3 Collegian).

On our dealings with non-native English speakers, we all recognize a lower level of difficulty that we're willing to deal with. When the shoe is on the other foot, like we've just landed a chance to spend time in France, we certainly hope for comparable reception of our probably not-too-perfect French.

Beyond this level, language differences are harder to tolerate. Let me caution, though, that there is no absolute criterion by which we can judge these things. Each of us is willing to tolerate a different level of difficulty before we get totally frustrated (in fact, different levels at different times). So any screening policy has to be based on common sense and must accept the inevitability of some incorrect evaluations.

For six years K-State has required non-native English GTAs (but no others) to pass an oral screening before classroom duties can begin. Students encountering problems should certainly try to work them out with the GTA, then the department head or GTA adviser, and finally the dean. It's a good idea to let me know about serious problems too, since as chairman of the screening committee, I can tighten or loosen the process as conditions warrant.

The fact that only GTAs are scrutinized by this committee does not imply that the University hires other categories of instructors sight unseen. Departments make judgments about applicants' English abilities whether they are non-native speakers or not. The question whether such judgements should be raised to the level of official policy has, so far as I know, received no great discussion. I think most of us sense an unspoken consensus in favor of the status quo.

In general, I think problems involving language receive satisfactory solution through the existing mechanisms. But the key is twofold: tolerance up to a limit, and then doing something about it before it's too late.

Mother of quintuplets wins jeep

BERNARDS TOWNSHIP, N.J. — Recently widowed quintuplets mother Peggy Jo Kienast won a $15,000 Jeep in a school raffle after an anonymous Morristown resident bought a ticket in her name.

"It was a wonderful shock," Kienast said Monday, adding that her family of eight has been using an old car borrowed from a friend.

The family faced a series of financial problems in recent years and an anonymous donation last year saved their home from a sheriff's auction.

The $100 raffle ticket was only the latest gesture of support for the family since William Kienast committed suicide March 3. Following his death, neighbors and friends established a fund for the family and have collected more than $90,000, mostly in small donations.

The raffle, held last week, has raised about $13,000 for the Winston School in Summit, a private institution for youngsters with learning disabilities, said school headmaster Jay Dewey.

The 14-year-old quints — Amy, Gordon, Ted, Sarah and Abigail — have a brother, John, 16, and a sister, Margaret, 18.

Severinsen defends arts education

PLANO, Texas — Doc Severinsen, orchestra leader on the "Tonight Show," says a "back-to-basics" move in education would be harmful if it cuts funds for non-academic subjects such as music and arts.

"Playing a musical instrument provides a center for young people who might not otherwise be able to express themselves. It also opens up those who only know how to express themselves scholastically," he said Monday in Plano where he performed with the high school band.

A committee studying education reform in Texas has suggested less emphasis on extracurricular activities.

Statler Brothers win music awards

NASHVILLE — Country music fans have voted the Statler Brothers No. 1 in popularity, as super group Alabama mustered only half as many honors.

In fan-voted awards announced Monday night, the Statlers won four categories and Alabama won two in the 18th annual popularity contest sponsored by The Music City News, a Nashville country music tabloid published monthly.

The Statlers, a quartet discovered by Johnny Cash more than 20 years ago, won best comedy act, top vocal group, single of the year for "Elizabeth" and No. 1 television special for "Another Evening With The Statler Brothers — Heroes, Legends and Friends."

Alabama won band of the year and album of the year honors for the million-selling "The Closer You Get."

KC tops Toronto

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Hal McRae and Steve Balboni snapped out of batting slumps long enough to deliver key hits Tuesday night in Kansas City's 4-3 victory over the Seattle Mariners.

McRae singled in the sixth, breaking an 0-for-11 skid, and went to second when shortstop Spike Owen threw the ball away. An infield out sent McRae to third. Darryl Motley doubled him in to break a 2-2 tie.

Rookie Mark Gubicza gave up six hits and struck out six through seven innings to raise his record to 3-4. Dan Quisenberry entered the game with one on and none out in the eighth and notched his league-leading 13th save, despite giving up a two-out RBI single to Jack Perconte in the ninth.

Bradshaw calls it quits

By The Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — Quarterback Terry Bradshaw, who passed the Pittsburgh Steelers to four Super Bowl championships, said Tuesday he will undergo elbow surgery this summer that likely will end his career in the National Football League.

"My gut feeling is that it's over. I can't see myself coming back," Bradshaw told The Pittsburgh Press. "My plan is to get operated on so I can lead a normal, adult life, not so I can come back and play football."

He also told the Shreveport Times, a newspaper in his Louisiana hometown, that the operation "takes from a year to a year and a half to recover from" and he is planning a future out of football.

But Bradshaw, 35, left the door open for a return by telling Pittsburgh radio station KQV Tuesday: "My intentions are to get operated on and to hopefully be able to continue playing football."

The Steelers, however, said:

"We're assuming he's retiring."

"We will miss Terry," Steelers President Dan Rooney said after talking with Bradshaw by phone Tuesday. "The entire Steelers organization will always be grateful for his contributions to the team."

"Terry Bradshaw had a great career. In fact, in my opinion, he was the best quarterback who ever played football," Rooney said.

Bradshaw was en route to a celebrity golf tournament bearing his name in El Paso, Texas, Tuesday and was not available for comment to The Associated Press.

Bradshaw underwent surgery after the 1982 season to repair torn ligaments in his right elbow. He missed the 1983 season except for 16 minutes against the New York Jets in which he threw a pair of touchdowns passes.

Steelers spokesman Joe Gordon said team officials aren't ruling out the possibility that Bradshaw, who will be 36 in September, might be able to play after the operation.

"We're not closing the door on this but we're assuming he's retiring," Gordon said.

Connors, McEnroe win in tourney

By The Associated Press

PARIS — Playing superb tennis, John McEnroe and Jimmy Connors are in the semifinals of the French Open championships, each seeking to become the first American to capture the men's singles crown since 1955.

In the women's singles, Martina Navratilova kept alive her own hopes of capturing her fourth consecutive Grand Slam title, but still has to contend with her old rival, Chris Evert Lloyd.

Both reached the semifinals Tuesday, along with No. 9 Hana Mandlikova of Czechoslovakia and unseeded Camille Benjamin of Bakersfield, Calif.

Today, the last semifinal pairing was set when defending men's champion Yannick Noah of France played Sweden's Mats Wilander and Andres Gomez of Ecuador took on second-seeded Ivan Lendl of Czechoslovakia.

McEnroe gained the semifinals with a 6-3, 6-4, 6-4 triumph over fellow American Jimmy Arias while Connors, seeking the only Grand Slam title that has eluded him, ousted ninth-seeded Henrik Sundstrom of Sweden 7-6, 6-1, 6-4.

In Tuesday's other matches — both fourth-round battles — Noah, outlasted Hungary's Balazs Taroczy 3-6, 6-2, 7-6, 7-6, while No. 4 Wilander, crushed Spain's Juan Aguilera 6-2, 6-1, 6-3.

Just let Magic work Laker tricks

When the Los Angeles Lakers and Boston Celtics hit the hardwood tonight for game four of the National Basketball Association finals the stage will be set for the performances of two of basketball's premier players, Earvin "Magic" Johnson and Larry Bird.

Lately, there has been a lot of debate on the air and in print over which one is better, and all-in-all the results are fairly even.

Almost everyone agrees that Bird has the better outside shot and that no one orchestrates an offense like Magic. Both are good rebounders and excellent passers. They're both great, but if I had a team with four average players and had to select either Bird or Magic to be the fifth starter I'd pick Magic.

My main reason for choosing the Magic man is that he makes his teammates play better. Whether tossing a no-look pass for an easy layup or pumping his team up with high fives, Magic is the ultimate team player. No player can control a game as

HUEY COUNTS
Staff Writer

Magic can. "He's the only player who can take only three shots and still dominate a game," said Julius Erving, after the Lakers had defeated his Philadelphia 76ers in the 1982 NBA finals.

Throughout this year's playoffs, Magic has been at his best. He, more than anyone else, has led the Lakers' charge through the Celtics in this year's finals. His 27 rebounds leads the team, and he has directed an offense that is shooting 53.3 percent with seven players at 50 percent or better.

Magic set a playoff record Sunday with 21 assists and they weren't just passes to Kareem Abdul-Jabbar in the middle. And, in the meantime, he still managed to grab a team-high 12 rebounds.

Also, Magic is a proven winner. As a senior, he led his high school to the state championship. He was named the Most Valuable Player when his team, Michigan State, won the NCAA championship against Larry Bird's Indiana State. He was just 20 years old during his rookie season in the NBA when he led the Lakers to the championship and was named MVP. Two years later, 1982, he directed Los Angeles to another title and was again named the MVP.

Magic is well on his way to a third MVP award and a third championship ring.

Bird is a great player, possibly the best forward to have ever played the game, but when it comes to "winning time" just put the ball in Magic's hands and let him work his tricks.

City constructs fire station

New facility expands service

By KELLY CARLSON
Staff Writer

The Manhattan Fire Department is changing everything from its building to its attire.

Construction of the city's new fire station, located at the northeast corner of Denison and Kimball avenues, has been underway since groundbreaking ceremonies in March.

The new facility, scheduled for completion by April 1, 1985, is being built to better accommodate expansion of the fire department and the city.

"Our prior facilities are inadequate," said William D. Smith, city fire chief. "We (the fire department) have expanded and have simply outgrown the downtown facility."

Because of Manhattan's growth, the location of the new facility will enable the firefighters to reach the northeast and northwest sections of the city more quickly than would be possible from the downtown station, Smith said.

The new station will include a 10,000-square-foot training accommodations classroom.

"This (training classroom) was designed with the idea of a student firefighters program," Smith said.

Smith explained that the program is still in its early stages, and will be further examined after the completion of the facility.

The existing downtown station will continue operation as a substation.

"It (the downtown station) will still be a fire station because of its proximity to downtown, Aggieville and the (K-State) campus," Smith said. "It will also be cheaper to maintain this facility than it would be to build another station."

Another new fire department development pertains to the purchase of the two silver-colored suits which resemble astronaut attire.

The purpose of the suits is to protect firemen dealing with dangerous chemicals.

"We are becoming more conscious of chemicals all the time," said Larry Reese, deputy fire chief. "We have more exposure to chemicals than ever before."

The suits cost $1,300 apiece, and have an inner lining of Butyl, a rubber-like compound, and an outer lining of Nomex, a fire-resistant fabric originally developed to protect race car drivers.

The suits are able to withstand the approximate heat intensity encountered during a housefire.

"The suits will provide protection for firefighters if they enter an atmosphere of chemicals," Reese said. "They are not used to directly enter a fire, but to provide protection in the case of a flash-fire in which a sudden burst of fire occurs."

The suits have not yet been tested in an actual emergency situation; however, the firemen are training with them.

"We (fire department) are still waiting on further information from the (manufacturing) company as to the time allowances permitted (by the suits) around chemicals," Reese said.

Staff/Chris Stewart

Construction of Manhattan Fire Department's fire station and training facility, at the corner of Denison and Kimball avenues, has progressed since its March groundbreaking. The station is scheduled to be completed by April 1, 1985.

'Big Red One' observes D-Day anniversary

Parade highlights festivities

By WAYNE PRICE
Arts and Features Editor

It was 40 years ago Wednesday that soldiers of the 1st Infantry Division from Fort Riley landed on the beaches in Normandy, France to participate in "Operation Overlord," the largest amphibious assault in history.

Exactly 40 years later, current members of the 1st Infantry Division, the "Big Red One," paid homage to those veterans at an all-day commemoration/celebration at Fort Riley.

See related story, page 6

The events Wednesday began at 6:30 a.m. with a cannonade. Six 105 millimeter howitzers fired 10 rounds from different positions around the base.

Capt. Doug Bidel, one of the organizers for the commemoration, said the time of the cannons' firing was significant in that it was the same time the first troops landed on the beaches. The actual firing of the cannons represented the support fire from the numerous ships off-shore during the soldiers' ascent to the beaches, he said.

Tanks, cannons, a helicopter and numerous other pieces of machinery were on display all day surrounding the Junction City Park, attracting curious onlookers, both military and non-military.

At 10 a.m., both sides of Washington Street were filled for approximately a mile with spectators as 2,500 troops marched down the street to pass the review stand which included Gov. John Carlin, Maj. Gen. Neil Creighton, commander of the 1st Infantry Division at Fort Riley; Susan Eisenhower, granddaughter of Gen. Dwight Eisenhower; and Carlton Barrett, one of the three division Medal of Honor recipients honored during the commemoration.

A miniature beach was staged in front of the review stand and Eisenhower scattered sand collected from Omaha Beach 40 years ago onto the staged beach at the beginning of the parade.

Barrett, in a wheel chair on the review stand, sat tall and smiled as his former regiment, the 18th, marched by and saluted him. He also received a standing ovation from the other members on the stand.

Barrett received the citation after the invasion for his role as a guide on the beaches.

His citation, in part, reads, "Near St. Laurent-Sur-mer, France, Private Barrett waded ashore under heavy enemy fire in neck-deep water. Disregarding the personal danger, he returned to the surf time and time again to assist his floundering comrades. In the face of intense small arms and mortar fire, he worked with fierce determination in saving many lives by carrying casualties to an evacuation boat lying offshore. In addition to his assigned mission as a guide, he carried dispatches the length of the fire-swept beach, assisted the wounded, calmed the shocked, and arose as a leader in the stress of the occasion."

Also being honored were 1st Lt. Jimmie Monteith and technician fifth grade John Pinder, who both died on the beaches 40 years ago.

The last group to march past the stand were members of the 1st Aviation Unit. Ten vintage World War II aircraft flew over the parade. The planes were part of the Confederate Air Force, a national organization which preserves such aircraft.

Bidel estimated that 250-300 veterans from the D-Day invasion were present at the day's activities. A large number of them met at the Visitors' Building and rode together in buses to the parade.

Mondale works to gain delegate votes

By The Associated Press

Walter F. Mondale scurried to cement his claim to the Democratic presidential nomination Wednesday even as Gary Hart reasserted his determination to continue an "overtime" fight beyond the primary season.

See related stories, page 8

"We must go forward and we will," Hart said at a news conference in Los Angeles at the moment that Mondale was telling reporters in Minnesota that "the race for the majority is over."

Mondale had the support of more than enough delegates needed to claim the nomination at the Democratic National Convention — if he can hold their allegiance — according to The Associated Press delegate count.

Although making no claim to the nomination for himself, the Rev. Jesse Jackson said it is too soon to be announcing Mondale because the convention delegates "can vote their conscience" under 1984 party rules.

The black civil rights leader, who added a historic perspective to the primary season by running the race from start to finish, said he will meet with Hart and Mondale before next month's San Francisco convention to discuss his goals.

"The bottom line is my self-respect," he said at a news conference in Los Angeles. "They must come to grips with respecting our role in this process."

As the rivals for the party's top prize took their disagreement into the post-primary phase of a campaign that started last fall and ended with a five-state burst Tuesday, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. declared "it's all over" and called on Hart and Jackson to "stop playing games" and fall in line behind the former vice president.

O'Neill, an early Mondale supporter, said he would meet Hart in Washington on Thursday despite Hart's stated intention to wage a fervent telephone courtship of possibly wavering delegates.

The Mondale machine, meanwhile, pressed a coast-to-coast effort to draw out closet supporters to underscore publicly the candidate's claim to 2,008 delegates — well over the 1,967 required for the nomination.

The Associated Press count, growing throughout the day, placed Mondale at 1,969 delegates — many of them well-known local political figures who had held back on a formal public commitment.

Hart had 1,222 and Jackson 374. The delegate totals this year are subject to change right up to the convention roll call, since the rules do not bind any of the delegates to the candidate they were elected to support. And 568 of the delegates are formally unpledged as well.

The Mondale staff was contacting the delegates and relaying to news organizations, for confirmation, the names of those it found willing to declare their intentions.

Among them was Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young, who said at a news conference in Atlanta that he will back Mondale for president and Hart for vice president.

"I think a Mondale-Hart ticket with a Jesse Jackson platform will go a long way toward retiring Ronald Reagan" in the November general election, said Young.

Mondale, in a not-so-subtle effort to underscore his claim to the nomination, said he was eager to tackle Reagan — who was walking the beaches of Normandy and professing disdain for Democratic politics.

"A few hours ago Reagan said he would ignore the Democratic Party and the nominee," said Mondale. "Well, he's done a lot of pretending."

Mondale said the Republican incumbent has pretended he has no political problems, ticking off a

Ag finance seminars draw state's bankers

By GARY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

Methods of handling farmers' financial problems were the topic of an educational conference of the Kansas School of Agricultural Banking held this week at the Union.

The conference is sponsored by the Kansas Association Bank Agricultural Representatives, Cooperative Extension Service, College of Agriculture and K-State.

Members of the Kansas Bankers Association participated in the conference. They were divided into two sections: one- and two-year participants.

Participants in the first-year session dealt with the subject of making farm loans. This included instruction on how to set up the proper loan structure for repayment and documentation of the loan.

First-year participant, Mark Bacon, assistant vice-president of the Farmers State Bank at Lindsborg, said the conference provided information on legal issues.

"They're (the first year participants) working a lot on documentation, legal updates on what Kansas legislators are doing and many other topics," he said.

The second-year participants work in the area of farmer's estate planning, Bacon said.

Participants also heard speeches from several Kansas officials. Gov. John Carlin was the guest speaker for Wednesday's noon luncheon.

Carlin centered his talk on agriculture as he sees it today, and what needs to be done for the future to returning profit to Kansas agriculture operations, as well as the nation.

Carlin said he is concerned with the "real trouble we're in today."

"I'm not here to tell you that I have all the answers," he said, "but I think there are some basic directions that must be taken or we simply will not, literally, have agriculture survive as we know it today."

Carlin also said he believed the first thing to do was to educate "particularly," the American people and public officials.

"We (consumers of agricultural products) are very dependent upon the sales of the production coming from the farms of this country," Carlin said.

Other issues Carlin addressed included the need for stronger action to be taken on reducing the deficit, and the importance for more effective communication in agriculture.

The conference will continue through Friday. Today's guest lecturer will be Kansas secretary of agriculture, Harland Priddy. His topic will also cover Kansas' agricultural and banking future.

Congressmen Dan Glickman and Pat Roberts will make presentations beginning at 11 a.m. Friday. They will discuss the "Agricultural and Financial Policy from the National Perspective."

Mothers shape up for two

By VIKKI WATSON
Staff Writer

There's the familiar beat of "Let's Get Physical" in the background as the six stretched bodies twist, lift, pull and push in response to the guidance of their exercise instructor. It's an exercise program typical of the various programs designed to help women, and men also, get into shape. This exercise program differs, however, from all other programs in one very distinct way.

These exercise enthusiasts are twisting, lifting, pulling and pushing for two.

It's an exercise program for the mother-to-be, the woman wanting to shape up and ship her baby out with as little discomfort as possible. The class, offered by Magic Mirror and headed by instructor Leslie Bynum, hopes to accomplish just that.

"If you exercise during your pregnancy you'll get back into shape faster," said Bynum, who offers two morning and two night classes a week for pregnant women. "Right now we're just doing a lot of spot exercising and helping them tone up."

And those spot exercises include leg lifts, push-ups, sit-ups and a variety of other stretching movements — anything and everything to help the soon-to-be mother keep, or become, physically fit. It's exercise that most certainly will benefit the mother, both during the pregnancy and during the time of delivery, Bynum said.

"It won't shorten your delivery time, but it will make it easier because your muscles can take the strain," she said.

Cindy Culver Burke, health educator at Lafene Student Health Center, agreed, saying that especially strengthening the abdominal and back muscles can

Police arrest new suspects in drug case

By The Associated Press

JUNCTION CITY — Three more people have been arrested on drug charges in the wake of a drug raid Sunday in which a Junction City teen-ager was shot and killed accidentally.

Police said Garland Hull, 21, who was named in one of the 14 federal warrants issued before the raid, surrendered to the Geary County Sheriff's Department Tuesday. The federal warrant charged him with two counts of cocaine distribution.

Hull's arrest brought to 11 the number of people arrested on federal warrants. Six others, including two arrested Tuesday, face state charges in Geary County District Court, said County Attorney Steven Opat.

The arrests on state charges took place Tuesday while police were serving search and arrest warrants. Taken into custody were Karen M. Everett, 29, who was charged with five counts of selling hallucinogenic drugs, and Willie J. Hall, 52, who was charged with possession, distribution and sale of narcotic and/or prescribed drugs, possession of marijuana with the intent to sell and possession of cocaine and heroin.

Authorities said Brian Montgomery, 17, was accidentally shot and killed Sunday during a raid on a Junction City residence. U.S. Attorney Ben Burgess said Montgomery was being searched by an officer when Montgomery thrust back against the officer, who fell to the floor and accidentally discharged his firearm. Montgomery, who suffered a gunshot wound to the neck, had not been named in a warrant.

Administration denies tax agreement reports

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration opened hearings Wednesday on overhauling the federal income tax system by denying reports it already has agreed to recommend a flat-rate tax that would apply equally to everyone regardless of earnings.

"Nothing could be further from the truth," said John Chapoton, assistant treasury secretary for tax policy. "The issues are open."

If President Reagan and his Treasury officials have not made up their minds, several testifying at the hearing have. Reflecting public opinion polls that find strong support for a single-rate tax, several witnesses hailed it as the logical solution to perceptions of unfairness and complexity in the present system.

"The law has made cheats and liars of us all," said Roger T. Burson of Marshall, Va. A flat tax on all income and elimination of all deductions and exemptions would be fair and just, he said.

"The graduated income tax penalizes the successful," he contended.

The Treasury Department held the hearing, the first in a series in seven cities, in response to Reagan's order to make recommendations on how to improve the tax system. The department plans to report after the November elections and Congress is expected to devote a considerable amount of time to the subject next year.

In calling for the report, Reagan concluded the current system is so complex and perceived to be so unfair that it has become ineffective.

The first witness disputed at least

Deb Eakes and Linda Ambrose do floor exercises as part of a pre-natal exercise class at Magic Mirror Tuesday night. The class for expecting mothers is taught four times weekly by Leslie Bynum, who believes that pre-natal exercise benefits the mother, both during the pregnancy and at the time of delivery.

litany of items the Democrats plan to make campaign issues: nuclear arms control, the economy, pollution, women's rights and minorities. Questioned on campaign strategy against the Democrats, Reagan told a television interviewer: "Just tell them what we've done and what we're going to do and pretend they're not there."

Hart acknowledged that he has no hope of springing any surprises in the next few days to counter Mondale's claim to a delegate majority, but pledged a gradual effort to win converts by pressing his contention — with the help of public opinion polls — that he would be a stronger candidate to challenge Reagan.

Using a sports contest analogy, as he so often has in other primary post-mortems, Hart greeted reporters Wednesday with: "Welcome to overtime."

Hart — who started the primary season with an upset victory in New Hampshire and ended it with a 2-1 triumph over Mondale in California on Tuesday — said he talked with about a dozen party leaders early

Wednesday and "few, if any, believe this race is over."

O'Neill, clearly, was not among them.

"For all practical purposes, it's all over," the nation's ranking elected Democrat told reporters as he entered the Capitol Wednesday. "There's no question in my mind that Mondale has it on the first ballot" at the July nominating convention.

Here are how Tuesday's primaries wound up:

CALIFORNIA — Hart won 205 delegates to 72 for Mondale and 29 for Jackson. There was no popular vote.

NEW JERSEY — Mondale got 45 percent of the vote to 30 percent for Hart and 23 percent for Jackson. He shut out Hart in delegates, 97-0. Jackson got 10.

WEST VIRGINIA — Mondale took 54 percent, Hart 37 percent and Jackson 7 percent. Mondale won 21 delegates, Hart 14 and Jackson none.

NEW MEXICO — Hart won with 46 percent to 36 percent for Mondale and 12 percent for Jackson. The delegate split there was 12 for Hart and 11 for Mondale.

SOUTH DAKOTA — Hart took 51 percent to 39 percent for Mondale and 5 percent for Jackson. That gave Hart nine delegates, Mondale six.

Tax

The first witness disputed at least part of that conclusion. David A. Berenson, a partner in the international accounting firm of Ernst & Whinney and a recognized authority on the tax system, noted that last year, nearly 40 percent of individual taxpayers filed the short Form 1040A or the 10-line Form 1040EZ. Millions more filed the long Form 1040 just so they could claim relatively simple adjustments, such as moving expenses, or itemize deductions, he added.

"For all these people, the system is not unduly complex," Berenson said. Much of the complexity is in the law as a result of efforts to make the system more equitable to more taxpayers, he added.

But junking the present law, with the graduated rates that take an increasingly larger share of larger incomes, would not guarantee either simplicity or fairness, Berenson said. A pure flat tax — one rate applying to all income and elimination of deductions and exemptions — might be simple, he said, but "it is politically unworkable and most likely would be unfair."

Congress and the Reagan administration are focusing on four broad proposals for changing the tax system:

—The flat tax, under which all income — except for a tax-free living allowance of $5,000 to $10,000 — would be taxed at a single rate, ranging upward from 10 percent. This plan envisions elimination of most deductions, exemptions and credits. It is considered politically unlikely because it would cut the taxes of the rich while requiring lower- and middle-income people to pay more.

—A tax on consumed income. This would tax only money that is spent; savings would be exempt.

—A value-added tax, or VAT, a national sales tax which would apply to the value added to a product or service at each stage or production. In the end, the buyer pays it all.

—Keep the present system, under which the percentage of tax rises with income, but eliminate most deductions in order to broaden the tax base. The most popular form of this proposal was offered by Sen. Bill Bradley, D-N.J., and Rep. Richard Gephardt, D-Mo., under which most people would pay a 14 percent tax; the maximum rate would be 30 percent, compared with the present 50 percent.

Fall enrollment begins

On Friday, the first of an estimated 3,000-4,000 new students will begin to arrive on the K-State campus to enroll for the 1984 fall semester. Transfer students will enroll only on June 9 and 22.

Organized, one-day sessions for enrollment will continue through June 23.

Marilyn Trotter, director of new student programs, said the daily sessions will concentrate on three areas of concern for new students: academics, housing and financial aid.

Each day, new students and their parents, will register the Union courtyard before separating to attend various meetings. The students will attend meetings orientating them on the services available for students, scholarship information and data collection for advising.

Parents will attend an informative session about student matters on campus and also receive an escorted tour of campus. Lunch will be in the Union Stateroom with the staff of the Student Affairs office.

After lunch, parents may attend a small group meeting with current K-State students so that they (the parents) can ask questions. The new students will be meeting with their advisers at this time.

Approximately 250 new students are expected to attend the sessions each day, Trotter said.

Although the organized sessions for new student enrollment ends June 23, "drop-ins" are welcome from June 26 through July 20, except for the week of July 4, Trotter said.

House gives approval to agriculture package

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House approved on Wednesday by voice vote a $34.2 billion 1985 agriculture bill for programs ranging from crop subsidies to food stamps.

Approval came after the House, by a 232-164 vote, made a 1 percent across-the-board cut in the original $34.5 billion measure.

Rep. Robert Walker, R-Pa., who proposed the cut, called it "one small step toward fiscal responsibility." The motion passed with the backing of 101 Democrats and 131 Republicans.

The measure now goes to the Senate.

In approving the bill, the House turned back another attempt to save $24 million by implementing recommendations of President Reagan's cost-cutting commission, and defeated a try to increase money for frontier research in genetic engineering.

The measure includes about $10.9 billion for agriculture programs, including price supports, research, extension services, crop insurance and food inspection. It also provides $4.9 billion for rural development programs such as housing loans, lending for rural water and sewer projects, and money for soil conservation and assistance to rural electric cooperatives.

Domestic food programs administered by the Agriculture Department are tabbed at $17 billion, including $10.7 billion for food stamps. The bill also includes $1.3 billion for international food assistance such as the Food for Peace program, and $427 million to fund the Food and Drug Administration and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

The House exceeded administration requests on items like rural housing and development projects and soil conservation, but made it up by cutting from the budget of the Commodity Credit Corporation — which handles price supports — and other areas.

The Reagan administration said the measure was "consistent with the president's objectives," although it was much like the current year's package which Budget Director David Stockman had fought, saying it was full of deceptive gimmicks.

The bill's backers, led by House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jamie Whitten, D-Miss., argued that the measure actually came in with a pricetag $4 million below the amount requested by the White House. The amount is an increase of $430 million over current spending levels.

But Walker called that contention "a sham" and noted that the bill actually could cost several billion dollars more than Reagan's request because it funds food stamps and nutrition programs for less than a full year. Supplemental appropriations will be needed later to keep the programs from running out of money.

Construction firm to repay state

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A southeast Kansas construction firm and its officers will pay $150,000 to the state over three years for reimbursement of alleged overcharges in highway contracts, Attorney General Robert Stephan announced Wednesday.

The settlement with Beachner Construction Co. of St. Paul, two related companies and the four brothers who operate the firms concludes the state's investigation into highway bid-rigging in Kansas.

The agreement also brings to $5.1 million the amount of money contractors have agreed to return to the state in the bid-rigging probe.

None of the Beachners nor the firms were convicted in the government's investigation.

Named in the settlement was the Beachner Construction Co., Beachner Brothers Construction Co. and Fred Beachner Construction Co., all of St. Paul. The individuals were William Beachner, Robert Beachner, Jerry Beachner and Eugene Beachner.

Under the settlement, the state agrees not to bring any criminal or civil lawsuits against the individuals and corporations related to bid-rigging. In addition, the Beachners do not admit to violations of federal or state antitrust laws which prohibit rigging of bids.

"There was a possibility the attorney general would file a civil action. The Beachners were aware of that," Neil Woerman, special assistant to Stephan, said in explaining why a settlement was accepted by the contractors.

Stephan's announcement Wednesday marked the 14th and final settlement with a construction company in Kansas.

Beachner Construction and Robert Beachner were acquitted of bid-rigging charges in 1982. The company and Jerry Beachner later were indicted on antitrust charges.

Ag merger nears completion

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY — The Farmland Industries, Inc., board of directors on Wednesday moved a step closer to a merger between the Kansas City-based organization and MFA, Inc.

The Farmland board authorized the regional cooperatives' management to prepare "a definitive plan for reorganization or consolidation with MFA," according to a statement released by the board.

The resolution approved by the board specified no time table for drawing up the plan, but called for negotiations "to begin at once with the objective of reporting back to the board as soon as possible."

Farmland is a regional farm supply and marketing cooperative which serves local cooperative associations in 19 Midwestern states. The cooperative reported sales in 1983 totaling $4.7 billion.

The Columbia-based Midcontinent Farmers Association serves farmers and cooperatives in Missouri. MFA sales in 1983 totaled $680 million.

Top MFA officers were authorized by the association's board of directors last week to explore plans for consolidating or merging the two cooperatives' grain merchandising and farm supply operations.

The action taken Wednesday by the Farmland board amounts to the same step. Once plans are approved they will have to be voted on by both boards, and may have to be submitted to the organizations' rank-and-file membership, according to a spokesman.

Democratic party needs unity in November

Walter Mondale seems to have finally gained the Democratic party nomination that many had conceded to him last year. After a suprisingly tough battle from Sen. Gary Hart, Mondale's resounding wins in the New Jersey and West Virginia primaries have brought the former vice president to the brink of the 1,967 delegate votes needed for nomination at the Democratic National Convention in San Francisco.

This means the Democratic party hopes in 1984 now rest squarely on Mondale's shoulders. To have any hope of defeating a formidable opponent such as Ronald Reagan in November, party unity is vital.

The party needs only to look to the last presidential election to realize the consequences of disunity. In 1980, Jimmy Carter's campaign was hurt by the bad feelings of Edward Kennedy's supporters, who failed to fall into party ranks following the senator's nomination loss. Kennedy's subsequent snub of Carter after the delegate votes were tallied demonstrated to the voting public that the Democrats were not united as a strong political group.

At this year's convention, the party could be even more divided than in '80. Hart reportedly has become disenchanted with Mondale after Mondale's behavior when the race was hot. Mondale was quoted as calling Hart "a cold-hearted wrench" during the campaign, questioning the Colorado senator's identity and character.

Such mudslinging became standard fare, on both sides, in advertising and campaign speeches during the Democratic race. Mondale's attacks showed just how badly he wants to be president. Before 1974, Mondale was looked to as an extremely decent politician. But he has since resorted to stronger tactics as the stakes have grown. Although a degree of rhetoric is expected during a campaign, Mondale's attacks may dictate hard times in the union of party support between him and Hart.

The campaign of the Rev. Jesse Jackson has also splintered the party. Jackson's charges of unfairness in the party toward his campaign has left bad feelings among many of his supporters toward the Democrats — a largely ethnic group that spells voting power in November. Although most Jackson supporters would vote for any Democrat over President Reagan in the general election, the strength of ethnic support expected earlier may decline as the result of Jackson's charges.

Obviously, the Democrats have some making up to do in San Francisco come July. This time could be the key to any hope of party victory in 1984. Without this unity, the Great Orator, Ronald Reagan, will not need to do much talking to stay in the White House for another term.

Reagan health record means public hazards

There are some who believe that another four years of the Reagan administration could be hazardous to the health of the nation.

That may not be too far from the truth. Upon review of the Reagan administration's record, one notices a remarkable number of safety and health regulations that have been rewritten or canceled.

For example, rules have been rewritten by the Food and Drug Administration to allow the presence of carcinogens in food if they are a by-product of the manufacturing process. Also, hazardous liquid wastes can again be dumped in landfills due to some "regulation revision" by the Environmental Protection Agency.

The present administration's stand on regulations is apparent: the fewer, the better.

While regulations sometimes slow down business procedures and extraneous red tape can foul up even the best laid plans, the Reagan administration's war on regulations goes well beyond reason.

One must not forget the reasons behind the regulations: to protect the American public. Efficiency and a healthy economy mean nothing if consumers are dying from cancer and other diseases.

According to the National Academy of Sciences, of 53,500 chemicals in commercial use today, practically nothing is known about 80 percent of them.

Thus, when regulations on health and safety are cut and chemicals and wastes are allowed into the market, money may be saved, but no one knows the long-run costs.

Reagan's effort to trim the national budget is commendable. But most would agree that measures to save human lives are more important than cutting red tape.

Reagan recommends small towns

NEW YORK — President Reagan, who grew up in Dixon, Ill., and attended Eureka College, says he'd recommend that young people grow up in small towns.

"I think that in a small town where you're not anonymous, where you're recognized — and it's the same when you get to a small campus — you can't hide. You know that you're known. There are more things expected of you," the president said in an interview with Family Weekly magazine.

Ex-hostage reveals fear of ordeal

FAYETTEVILLE, Ga. — Col. Charles Scott, one of the 52 Americans held hostage in Iran, said his biggest worry during his captivity was that his captors would blame him for the disabling of computers on the Iranian air force's new F-14 Tomcat fighter planes.

At a recent autograph party in Fayetteville, where he was promoting "Pieces of the Game," his book about being a hostage, Scott explained what happened to the Tomcats.

When it appeared the shah was about to fall from power, the U.S. government decided the planes' computers should be disabled so Khomeini's forces could not use them, he said. The programming from the jets' navigation and targeting computers was erased, making the Tomcats nothing more than "expensive transportation devices."

Thief steals billionaire's wallet

DENVER — The wallet of a billionaire listed as the nation's 13th richest man was stolen from a locker room at the Denver Athletic Club, but it contained only $50 and credit cards, police say.

Philip F. Anschutz of Denver was playing squash at the club Monday when his wallet was taken from the inside pocket of his sport coat, according to police reports.

Anschutz, 44, is president of Anschutz Corp. and last year was listed by Forbes Magazine as the 13th richest man in the United States. His net worth was estimated at at least $1 billion, but he disputes that.

In democracy, worst often drives out the best

According to George Roche in his book "The Bewildered Society": "...American democratic politics has operated according to Gresham's law. The worst political type generally drives out the best." Having witnessed the presidential election of a corrupt type in 1972 (Nixon), an unqualified type in 1976 (Carter), and finally an incompetent type in 1980 (Ronald Reagan), this "law" does seem to have a certain empirical validity.

The election of Reagan is particularly troubling, not for partisan political reasons, but because of his overall unworthiness to hold office. In my view, the trust between the president and the people is a social good, just as much as the air we breathe or the water we drink. To quote Albert Schweitzer's famous phrase, "leadership is example."

The Feb. 6 issue of Time magazine detailed the example that President Reagan has set, claiming that the president was "disengaged" from his duties as chief executive. Disengaged?

After examining his record of presidential performance, I was wondering whether he is plugged in at all. For example, he has greeted his own secretary of Housing and Urban Development, Samuel Pierce, at a reception for mayors by saying, "How are you Mr. Mayor? How are things in your city?" At a recent meeting with some governors Reagan kept referring to Environmental Protection Agency chief administrator William Ruckelshaus as "Don."

Unfortunately, Reagan's reign of error doesn't stop with these seemingly harmless mistakes. For, to paraphrase Abraham Lincoln's remark about a political opponent, Ronald Reagan appears to have such a high regard for the truth that he uses it sparingly.

For instance, he has said that the United States decreased military spending during the past decade; that Leonid Brezhnev was the first person to ever propose a nuclear freeze and, worst of all, that submarine-launched nuclear missiles are recallable. None of these statements have any factual basis.

Overall, one author has compiled a 300-page book of Reagan gaffs, misstatements and untruths. In light of these faux pas, it is not surprising that his aides often do not feel the need to arouse him from sleep when events such as the Libyan plane attack occurred.

When reviewing this history of administrative inability, one can only hope that there is method to his madness.

As Reagan wrote in "Where's the Rest of Me," his autobiography, "...so much of our profession is taken up with pretending that an actor must spend at least half his waking hours in a fantasy." One can only guess whether his view of politics is any different.

Campaign aides from 1980 recall Michael Deaver hiding copies of "Human Events" from Reagan because he had a tendency simply to repeat information from that ultraconservative and not-credible source. Apparently, "there is a generation gap between what Reagan thinks he knows about the world and the reality," says John Sears, who ran Reagan's 1976 campaign and half his 1980 race.

Indeed, President Reagan seems locked into a political time warp, somewhere around the 1950s — an era when men didn't eat quiche, everybody liked Ike, and American presidents solved problems by sending in John Wayne and the Marines.

To compound the problem, what the president lacks in accuracy, he also lacks in dedication. Not only does his staff basically run the country, but Reagan's frequent trips to California indicate that he is more at home riding the range, than reading the reports and studies that remain untouched on his desk.

As the president confided to a biographer, "I'm basically a lazy fellow. I work up to a certain point, but beyond that I say the hell with it."

A September 1981 Newsweek article quoted an unnamed White House aide as saying, "He probably spends two or three hours at most a day on real work." That makes the Oval Office the only institution open fewer hours than Farrell Library.

Being a magazine of some responsibility, Time made an effort to reassure those readers who were alarmed by the fact that the president can't find his way around the White House. The story goes on to say that, according to one White House aide, 80 percent of what Reagan doesn't know is unnecessary anyway.

That kept me calm for a while, until I began to wonder about that other 20 percent. What if that includes the perception that we can win a nuclear war and the Department of Defense computer mistakenly indicates a supposed Soviet attack? What if Reagan's advisers become deadlocked over the budget and his only alternative is to begin flipping quarters to determine policy?

And political scientists are trying figure out why people don't vote in presidential elections; it's a miracle that they can get to sleep at night.

Overall, one gets the impression that the light is on in the Oval Office but no one's at home. A comment once made by Samuel Johnson about a lady preacher seems to apply quite well to our current president. "Such a creature is like a dog walking on his hind legs. We do not expect the thing to be done well but are surprised that it can be done at all."

One must surely question the economic wizardry of a man who attempted to purchase four $2 hot dogs at this year's opening day baseball game with a $5 bill. No wonder the budget deficit is so large.

As a student of political science I have been taught that the presidency is "the great engine of democracy" and "the most important governmental institution in the world." Come on America, surely we can do better than this.

Paper neglects D-Day

Editor,

Congratulations, your staff has missed the boat once again. June 6, 1984, was the 40th anniversary of the allied invasion of Nazi-occupied Western Europe; a historical event that your paper either chose to ignore or did not think important enough to warrant attention.

I am not saying that your paper should provide full-page coverage, but a short paragraph remembering the Allied and German men whose lives were taken this day may have been appropriate. This day, June 6, 1944, is far too important to ignore. Sure, lives were lost in the most violent fashion, but dates like D-Day and other wars must be remembered. These wars and D-days must be remembered in order to avoid far worse wars.

Your paper had done a disservice to the community. You have insulted the veterans of that day and its significance, to those who fought it, but especially your profession.

In this light, allow me to extend my thanks to the veterans of D-Day and World War II. I apologize to those men and women who fought, bled and died in that war (of all nationalities) for what I believe to be an oversight of the Collegian.

Some of my generation may care less about D-Day. I apologize for their failure to appreciate the horrors previous generations suffered for me and my colleagues, your sacrifice has been my gain. Thank you.

KSDB offers alternate summer format

For a third summer, Manhattan residents will be offered a music alternative.

A wide variety of music — including everything from classical to heavy metal — will be part of KSDB-FM's summer format, said Will Perry, operations manager for the station.

"We (KSDB) can experiment around quite a bit with people's tastes and offer them (the listeners) formats that other stations can't," he said. "People listen to us because we're the only thing different in town. We're an alternative."

Although KSDB's largest listening audience is for the afternoon and evening rock programs, the station is trying to expand its audience for both the classical and jazz programs.

"We were given $600 by the Student Governing Association to develop the classical and jazz formats," Perry said. These two programs are on the air Monday through Friday from 9 a.m.-1 p.m.

"We've also lengthened our rock oldies program on Saturday afternoons," Perry said. "We did this because of some summer school figures we received from last year. They showed that the majority of listeners in Manhattan during the summer months were 25 years of age or older."

Play-by-play broadcasts of area baseball and softball games may also find their way into the upcoming summer program.

"Softball is big business in town," Perry said. "We (KSDB) have a mobile unit, which the SGA bought for us last fall, so we're going to try to get some use out of it."

The KSDB participation class, consisting of students who operate all aspects of the station, is made up of 18 students this summer. Because of the small number, each student has a larger work load compared to those who enroll during the regular semesters, Perry said.

"The participation class is essentially a volunteer operation because we can only offer one hour of credit," he said.

"There's a lot more going on here than just spinning records. Of course we're not as polished here as compared to other commercial stations, but then again, we are a learning facility."

Action film 'doom(ed)

Contrary to the claim made in the opening song of "Indiana Jones and the Temple of Doom," the sequel to "Raiders of the Lost Ark," anything does not go, at least not in feature films. But you have to give executive producer George Lucas and director Steven Spielberg credit for trying.

"Temple of Doom" is a smorgasbord of action, comedy and special effects. It has everything "Raiders" had and more. That's really its problem. As is often the case with sequels to successful Hollywood movies, "Temple of Doom" tries too hard to top the original.

There's nothing wrong with the basic plot. Archeologist Indiana Jones (Harrison Ford) is in a Chinese nightclub trying to collect his pay for recovering a rare artifact. Of course, his client is a villain and so tries a double-cross. This is where "Temple of Doom" begins to show it won't live up to expectations. The frenzied escape scene that follows is played more for laughs than hair-raising excitement, as in the opening scene of "Raiders."

The whole sequence showing Indy's escape from China to India just isn't believable, not even for a Lucas/Spielberg film. Following this, Indy and his two traveling companions, nightclub singer Willie Scott (Kate Capshaw) and oriental urchin Short Round (Ke Huy Quan), are enlisted to find and return a sacred stone and the children of the village from which it was stolen. The Temple of Doom is where our adventurers must go to accomplish this task.

You can guess the rest. Unlike the supernatural climax at the end of "Raiders," "Temple of Doom" ends predictably and rather ordinarily.

Granted, some of the action scenes are exciting, some of special effects are dazzling, and there are many funny moments in the two-hour-plus movie. Ford is his usual dashing, swaggering self, but these are only moments that just don't tie together. The fight scenes are far too conventional. Even the villains are less colorful — just a few blood-drinking pagans. They certainly aren't worthy of Indiana Jones for an opponent.

LINCOLN KONKLE
Reviewer

In "Raiders," there was an important supernatural element. Spielberg makes a weak effort to achieve that again with some shooting stars and glowing rocks. The trouble here is that the explanation of the legends behind the sacred stones, temple and so forth are mumbled unintelligibly by the actors. Not even sentimentalizing the movie with the brutal enslavement and subsequent rescue of children is enough to give the audience the emotional release movies should provide.

Some may say most of my criticism is based upon a comparison to "Raiders of the Lost Ark." Is that fair? Shouldn't "Temple of Doom" be judged solely on its own merits and faults? After all, "Raiders" is a tough act to follow. All true, but the clincher is that "Temple of Doom," in and of itself, isn't a very good movie. If it had come out prior to "Raiders," there would not be an Indiana Jones craze.

To its credit, there is one scene in the sequel involving thousands of insects, secret passageways and a metal-spiked ceiling that gets lower and lower in which the comedy, suspense and plot all come together beautifully, as most of the scenes in "Raiders" did.

Even with that, though, "Temple of Doom" can only be enjoyed by those fans who loved the first movie so much that they are willing to forgive just about anything to see more of a great character and more action per minute than three James Bond flicks put together. Still I bet they'll be disappointed.

Women

make the pregnancy term and delivery much easier.

"It (exercising) does increase the muscle strength and elasticity," Burke said. "By doing it you are going to get back in shape faster and it will make it easier during delivery."

Other discomforts many women encounter during their pregnancy — leg cramps, constipation and urination problems due to the baby resting on the bladder — can also be lessened, Burke said.

"If you continue with a routine exercise program, that helps to minimize those problems," she said. "If you are doing exercise it's going to cut down on the discomfort during pregnancy."

And it is this exercise continuity that Bynum offers in her classes, the type of exercise program that many programs can't offer until the later stages of pregnancy.

"This way they can do it (exercise) the whole time," said Burke, who offers classes that take effect before others (methods such as Lamaze do). "They (the women) feel like they have a jump on their classes. I feel good about that."

But it is the participants who feel good about the exercising — even those who found little to like about physical exertion before their pregnancy.

"I didn't think that pregnant people could exercise," said Judy McQuire, program participant who is 4½ months pregnant. "Now I think it's good for pregnant women to exercise. I know in the long run I'll be in better shape and, hopefully, delivery will be easier."

This awareness of the benefits of exercising — promoted by the current preoccupation with fitness — has helped exercise programs for the pregnant woman become popular, Burke said.

"The books are saying that you really need to do this and that it's OK," she said. "Society is promoting it and it gets through people's minds that 'I really need to do this.'"

And doing the exercises are safe for not only the woman in the early stages of pregnancy, but also for those facing their last days before delivery.

"I had one girl who exercised Tuesday morning, went into labor Tuesday night and had the baby Wednesday," Bynum said. "As long as you're not having any complications with your pregnancy and you're feeling fine, you can do it (exercise) right up to the time of your delivery."

"And as long as it doesn't promote any discomfort and if their body is used to it, there really isn't any reason why not," Burke said in reference to women exercising up to the time of delivery.

The exercising depends little on whether or not a woman was previously physically active or not — with patience the program will benefit even those who have led a very sedentary life.

"She (the woman who hasn't been physically active) will have to approach it at a much slower pace," Burke said. "Many times during pregnancy the pregnant woman has a tendency to say, 'I don't need to exercise.' (But) everyone knows when muscles aren't being used they become flabby."

"I worked out a year before the program, but I'm glad I continued," said Deb Eakes, who is still attending the classes during her seventh month of pregnancy. "I'd probably be sitting around at home (if not participating)."

So women such as Eakes and the many others like her will be sweating and stretching their way to fitness all the way to the delivery room — with yet another special advantage with which Bynum ended her exercise class.

Soldiers of the First Infantry Division, Fort Riley, salute as they pass the reviewing stand during a parade held to mark the anniversary of the D-Day invasion of the Allied forces. The First Infantry was responsible for securing Omaha Beach on D-Day.

D-Day Tribute to the past

He was sitting by himself in the Vistors' Building at Fort Riley Wednesday morning, waiting for the military bus to him to Junction City for the parade, and watching film clips from World War I on a video recorder. He was a large man in his 70s with dark hair flecked with gray on the sides.

"I hope I find some of my buddies," he said. When one finally showed up the two men didn't reminiscence about the experience shared together on the Normandy beaches 40 years earlier, but talked rather slowly and unsurely about politics, a new car and other irrelevant subjects.

When asked about his experience on D-Day, he began to talk louder and more enthusiastically.

"We knew what we were going into, but we were scared to death," said Willis Henderson, who operates a truck line in Garnett.

Henderson was a member of the 149th Engineer Combat Battalion of the 1st Infantry. His battalion was one of the first groups that hit the beach at Normandy June 6, 1944. It was responsible for detecting mines, clearing debris and setting up a beachhead on the many landing areas.

He proudly showed a photocopy of the commendation his battalion received for its efforts. In a large Manila envelope, Henderson carried many other such scraps from his war experiences.

"We hit the water which was about up to my neck, and bullets were hitting the water all around us," he said. "We were scared but we were well-trained; we did things almost mechanically. We just floated in and crawled up to the barbed wire. Still, we were very lucky to make it."

He said he knew that it was exceptionally vital they accomplish their assigned task — to destroy Hitler's Germany.

When asked what he thought about Hitler at the time, Henderson looked in disbelief as if seeing the dictator in person and said, "Whoo boy, that Hitler; he was a little sucker."

After defeating the German defenses on the hills by the beaches, Henderson said they (his battalion and the rest of the Allied Forces) continued fighting across a large plain similar to the ones in Kansas.

During the invasion, Henderson had no contact with his wife. She found out about the invasion when President Franklin D. Roosevelt made the announcement over the radio.

"She cried the whole time when she found out," Henderson said. "She knew I was there. I had been training in England six months before. Of course, all of our mail was censored, but she knew something like this was about to happen."

All in all, Henderson said he participated in four major campaigns: D-Day, the Battle of the Bulge, the liberating of Holland and Belgium and the march into the war-ravaged Germany.

"In Holland, it was just incredible," he said. "People came out that night in their nightclothes saying, 'we've waited so long for you to come.' They were hugging and putting their hands around us."

"There were little kids there. I felt so sorry for them out there in their wooden shoes in the cold. They were eating out of the garbage cans where the guys dumped out their rations."

Henderson said the mood between the American and Russian soldiers when meeting in Germany could be described as very shaky.

"We met up with a lot of Russians there," he said. "We kind of looked at each other pretty funny. They looked like a bunch of gypsies."

He remained somewhat sympathetic to the enemy even though he smiles as he remembers putting the German prisoners on KP (kitchen police) and making them shine his shoes.

"For the most part we treated them a whole lot better than they treated us. But shoot, it wasn't the German people's fault, it was the leaders' who got a hold of them. The same thing could happen to us."

Mondale support remains strong in Kansas

Officials predict first-ballot choice Uncommitted votes increase lead

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Despite Gary Hart's victory Tuesday in the California primary, Kansas Democratic leaders said Wednesday they believe Walter Mondale will be the party's presidential nominee against President Reagan this fall.

"My anticipation is the former vice president (Mondale) will get the nomination on the first ballot" at the San Francisco national convention opening July 16, said state party Chairman Pat Lehman of Wichita, who has declared her support for Mondale.

"I believe he has more than enough of the unpledged party and elected officials who haven't declared to put him over the top."

Dr. Bill Roy of Topeka, chairman of the Mondale caucus within the state delegation going to San Francisco, concurred in the assessment that the former vice president is headed for a first-ballot victory.

"I suspect several states are like Kansas, and have several unpledged delegates who are closet Mondale people," said Roy, a former congressman.

Roy said he believes Mondale will have 26 or 27 votes from Kansas delegates on the first ballot, although presently there are only 24 declared votes for him among the 44 delegates.

Kathleen Sebelius of Topeka, state coordinator of Hart's campaign in Kansas, agreed but said she thinks Mondale's struggle to nail down the nomination doesn't bode well for the former vice president's chances against Reagan in November.

"I think Mondale probably will be able to lock it up by the first ballot," said Sebelius. "A lot of those uncommitteds are regular party people who are likely to support Mondale."

"My over-all analysis is it's a long shot for Gary Hart, but it's a lot shorter than it seemed before the latest primaries. I think they demonstrate that Mondale is going to have a very hard time being elected."

Lehman discounted speculation Democrats are so divided because of the bitterly-fought battle among Mondale, Hart and the Rev. Jesse Jackson for the nomination that they can't unite to defeat Reagan. She said she is encouraged that Hart might be persuaded to join the ticket as the vice presidential nominee.

"I don't think that any of the three has forgotten that the objective of all of us... is to change the course of this country — change the leadership of this country," she said. "The goal is to defeat Ronald Reagan this fall, and I anticipate that's going to happen."

She said it is possible Hart could be perceived as a "spoiler" if he presses his fight for the nomination beyond a reasonable point, but said she doesn't think that will happen.

"I think he (Hart) is going to act in a responsible manner," Lehman said. "He obviously is in a position to be involved in the decision-making of the party and in having input into where the Democratic Party goes from here."

"My feeling is Sen. Hart is experienced enough and dedicated to a change enough that he won't play the role of spoiler."

"I notice now his campaign manager is not shutting the door to the possibility of the vice presidency. It appears to me that some consideration is being given to that possibility."

Sebelius said she doesn't know whether Hart would accept the No. 2 spot, adding, "I think, given the nature of the dialogue between him and Walter Mondale, it may be a little difficult. But they're both political animals."

She said there will be stronger pressure on Hart now from party leaders to give up the nomination chase, close ranks with Mondale and build unity for the campaign against Reagan.

"I think there will be tremendous pressure on him now not to go to the convention and fight a bloody fight," Sebelius said. "But a lot of those same people have been urging him to do that for the last six months. It's really up to the candidates now."

What Jackson does now is a key factor for the Democrats, both Sebelius and Roy said.

"If Mondale has the numbers on paper (to clinch the nomination), it's sort of irrelevant what Mr. Jackson does," Sebelius said. "But the party needs him to bring his constituency to the polls in November."

"He'll make some demands as far as the platform is concerned," Roy said, "but I think after the convention Jackson's going to be a very positive force as far as getting out the vote and helping Mondale."

Roy predicted Hart would carry on for a time his quest for the presidential nomination.

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Two previously uncommitted state delegates to the Democratic National Convention declared Wednesday their public support for Walter Mondale for the party's presidential nomination, giving him a solid edge in Kansas over Gary Hart.

State Treasurer Joan Finney of Topeka and state Rep. Ardena Matlack of Clearwater confirmed to the Associated Press they have told the Mondale organization they will vote for the former vice president on the first ballot at the San Francisco convention in mid-July.

Their declarations, along with those of other previously unpledged delegates in other states, pushed Mondale's total of delegates in the Associated Press' national count to 1,974, or seven more than needed for a first-ballot victory.

The Finney and Matlack declarations gave Mondale 25 delegates in Kansas to 17 for Hart, with only two state delegates still uncommitted.

Kansas had five uncommitted delegates when this week began, but one of them, Ickie Kiser of Stafford, confirmed to the AP on Monday that he would vote for Hart on the first ballot.

Kansas' remaining uncommitteds are Gov. John Carlin and state Rep. Norman Justice of Kansas City.

Carlin, chairman of the state's 44-member delegation, will remain uncommitted until the first ballot — barring some major development, such as Hart and the Rev. Jesse Jackson withdrawing their candidacies for the nomination, Mike Swenson, Carlin's press secretary, said Wednesday.

Carlin was state chairman of Ohio Sen. John Glenn's campaign until Glenn fell out of the race last March.

Finney and Matlack confirmed to the AP that they are supporting Mondale after the Mondale organization released to the news media in Washington a list of party and elected officials in the various states who were named delegates in an unpledged status — the so-called "super delegates" under this year's Democratic caucus system rules.
